POETRY.

REVERIE.

Only a few more tears,

Bitter tears,

And then—and then, like other men,
I cease to wander—cease to weep;
Bim shadows o'er my way shall creep,
And out of the day and into the hight,
I go—and death shall veil mol face fince
By very name and every trace
I leave on earth, for the stem years tread,
Tread out the names of the gone and dead.
And then—and then, like other men;
I close my eyes, and go to sleep;
Ah! me, the grave is dark and deep!

Alas! alas!
How soon we pass!
And, oh! we go
So far away!

When go we must,
From the light of life, and the heat of the strife,
To the peace of death, and the cold still dust,
We go, we go, and may not stay—
We travel the long dark, wearty way;
Into the darkness, out of the bright,
And then—and then, like other men—
We close our eyes and go to sleep—
We close our eyes and go to sleep,
Ah! me, the grave is lone and deep!

I saw a flower at morn so fair;
I passed at eve—it was not there;
I saw a sunbeam, golden bright,
I saw a cloud that sunbeam shroud;
And I saw night
Digging the grave of day;
The day took off her golden crown,
And sadly, slowly laid it down;
And day, at morn the sun's fair bride,
At twillight bens her brow and died.
And so, alas I like day we pass—
At morn we laugh,
At eve we weep,
At more we wake, At morn we wake, At night we sleep; We close our eyes and go to sleep— Ah! me, the prave is still and deep.

The Braes of Yarrow

Historical Tale of the Sixteenth Century.

'Here, Pate, give me a shoulder,' said Thislielaw briskly.'

Ding-8-'Doon leaned his head and arms against the wall, and his master climbed upon his back, reached the roof, easily knocked the boards aside, and drew himself up through the aperture. Barras followed.

Bring the light, one of you,' he shouted, looking back.

Hornie, with the nimbleness of a monkey, clomb up the giant's back, holding the cruzie in his hand. But as he was holding it out to Barras, accidentally or intentionally, the cruzie dropped to the ground and the light was extinguished. Barras swore, and Tus-law growled, for they were now in complete darkness. Hornie descended quickly to the floor and made a great ado seeking the lamp. One of the men produced a fiint, and presently a light was obtained. This time the dwarf managed to hand it up safely, and followed it himself. Ding-a-Doon ascended next, and in a few minutes all were up except one man.

They found themselves in a narrow low-dwarf managed to hand it up safely, and followed it himself. Ding-a'-Doon ascended next, and in a few minutes all were up except one man.

They found themselves in a marrow low-roofed passage, along which they moved cautiously, fearing some trap. The passage appeared to extend around the building, and all the cunning of Tushielaw and Barras failed to discover any outlet in the walls or floor. They congratulated themselves upon this, for the fewer the outlets the less chance there would be of escaping; and if the fugitives were penned in the passage they would be captured with little irouble.

The passion with which he regarded Mistress Spens—a passion rendered all the more fierce be the difficulty he had found in achieving its object—and the cupidity which attracted him to the wealth of Haistane, rendered Tushielaw eager in the pursuit.—But another and stronger motive urged him forward in the evil work—he knew that between Spens and him there was only one way of settling accounts—it was life against life.

With Barras there was a certain enmity arising from chagrin and disappointed ambition. He would not have troubled himself in the least about Spens had he not barred the way to the lordship of Binram. But since the way was barred, he wished to remove the obstacle as speedily and as effectively as possible. So these two united to hunt him down.

It was well that they had been proceeding cautiously, for at an angle of the building they came upon a chasm in the floor of about six feet wide. There was darknes below and darkness beyond. Their light only sufficed to show then the width of the hole, and to indicate the depth; it revealed no means of crossing or decending.

"Who joins me" said Tushielaw. 'I will jump across."

"Do," said Barras drily, 'and you will probably allight upon some tran which will have!

crossing or decending.

'Who joins me?' said Tushielaw. 'I will jump across."

'Do,' said Barras drily, 'and you will probably alight upon some trap which will hard you into the arms of the fiend who waits for you.'

'I have another plan, then,' and the Borderer smiled grimly, 'Which will cheat the fiend and our foes together.'

He took the Jeddart axes from his foster brother having placed them across the chasm, he cautiously tried their strength, then crawled across them and reached the other side in safety. He found that the suspicion of Barras had been nearer the mark than they had calculated. Sitting upon the side of the chasm he pressed the floor with his hand? it yielded to the slightest touch and sunk downward. Had he jumped, as he had proposed at first, he would not have troubled Spens again. Having warned his followers of the danger, he easily stepped over the trap, and waited for the others.—Barrasjoined him immediately, and the rest followed.

They now proceeded with even more caution than before and about twenty stens followers of the danger, he easily stepped over the trap, and waited for the others.—Barras joined him immediately, and the rest followed.

They now proceeded with even more caution than before, and about twenty steps brought him to the end of the passage, where they found two doors, one of them of strong oak, stadded with iron nails, opened into the tower where the friendly beacon of the hospice was kindled every night, and was now burning. The other door opened to the roof or ramparts of the building.

The first was fast, the second open; and the pursuers, leaving one man to guard the entance to the tower, passed upon the roof. Tushielaw again made use of his gigantic foster-brother's shoulders, this time to enable him to look in at one of the windows of the tower.

toster-brother's shoulders, this time to enable him to look in at one of the windows of the tower.

With a subdued growl of satisfaction he elipped to the ground again.

They are there—I saw them.'

Ding-a'-Doon and three of the men were planted round the tower, whilst Tushielaw, Barras and the others returned to the door. At first they stacked the portal with their axes; but it soon became apparent that the iron-studded woodwork was strong enough to resist their efforts for several hours. They were at this juncture at some loss for a battering ram or other engine by which an entrance might have been speedily forced.

Tushielaw, skilled in all tricks of border warfare, hit upon an expedient.

He set the men to work chipping the door which led to the roof. The splinters flew about like hail, and were hastily collected into a pile at the foot of the door they wished to force. Tushielaw applied a torch, but the chips were damp and refused to kindle. At length, however, by dint of much coaxing in the way of pulling and blowing from Tushielaw, who knelt before the fire with all the eagerness and devotion of a fire worshipper. Before his deity, a bright flame shot up, illuming his dark countenance.

Whilst the blue smoke curled and wreathed upward and over him, and the chips crackled and sent their sparks flying into his face and around him, Tushielaw remained on his knees encouraging the flame by feeding it with chips and blowing upon itygrorously. He smiled with diabolical satisfacton as he saw the flames rapidly rising.

The stout oaken door blistered and fretted and hissed as the fire begun to take effect upon it; whilst Barras and the men, encouraged by the success of the project thus far, continued lustily chopping the wood.
