CHAPTER XXV.

MANGLES' REVELATIONS.

"If I remember it, it is only with gratitude for my escape. Had I gone on I might have been as bad as you, and been lying there in the state you are at this moment. Eh, Wengie, don't you know?"

"Well, you no didn't faint me?" growled Mangles, a little put out at this. "If I have been fast in my day, ain't I paying for it now? Things are being squared without repentance, I think."

"Wrong, Mangles; altogether wrong," said the Squire earnestly. "The bodily wreck which has overtaken you is but the penalty for the violation of the laws of physical health. There's the moral evil you have done beyond all that, and you cannot but know that nothing you have suffered or will suffer can atone for that. Make the best of your time, I advise you."

"Well, Squire," responded Mangles, "you don't say but you may be about right, and I may think about it by and bye. Hilloa, there's Mother McGoon in her caps."

The last observation was caused by a loud and increasing noise of wild laughter and singing, which sounded first outside, but was every moment drawing nearer.

"You didn't tip her, did you?" asked Mangles, as they all stood to listen.

"Egad, yes," exclaimed the Squire, "I nearly smothered her in the passage; and gave her a half-a-crown to soothe her feelings."

"Then she has melted it, and has got sky high. Ah, she's in the passage, now you'll see her immediately."

"'Tis time we make our exit," said the lawyer, making for the door, followed by the rest, just as Mother McGoon emerged from the passage into the apartment, without her "mangle"—her long hair, mixed with grey, hanging in disorder about her face, a bottle in one hand, and a looking-glass of drunken happiness on her repulsive countenance.

"Och, by the powers, and the gentlemen are here yet," she exclaimed on getting sight of them. Then fastening more particularly on the Squire, she emitted a shrill scream of laughter, and shouted—

"Troth, and it's a brave broth av a boy ye are anyhow. Here any party jowed, drink av hilloa, ye divil, in the prime potteen."

"No, no, no," roared the Squire, backing against the wall, as she staggered towards him, flourishing the bottle in such a way that some of the contents flew out into his face.

"Won't ye, though? And d'ye call that manly, do ye? It's give me a kiss ye will, anyhow."

"Get away with you," roared the Squire, as she approached in her frightful ugliness, holding his stick in front to keep her off, amid the loud laughter of the others, who were highly tickled by the indecency of his position. He had backed into a corner and could not get past her.

"What! ye won't give me a kiss either? Och, but that's illigant manners ye are showin'. Its cally shy ye are, though, scin' as how I know ye are mighty fond av me, and don't like to show it afore folk. Niver mind, me darlint, I'll give you one."

And settling down the bottle on the floor, she, in her drunken hilarity, made towards him with outstretched arms and amatory intentions.

"Now, me own dear, lovin' darlint!" she shrieked.

"Get away, you filthy brute!" thundered the Squire.

Then he made a dash to get past; but, with a wild whoop and a terrible spring, she fastened her arms round his neck, and hung there, defying his utmost efforts to shake her off.

The mirth of the others was now uncontrollable. The Squire's horror as, in disgust, he averted his face from the threatened salute, and the woman's determined efforts to kiss him, were laughable in the extreme, and Mangles joined in the peals.

"Get away, I tell you, you dirty stinking hag, he roared. "Pull her off, some of you. Let go, you ugly old Irish wretch."
