

GENERAL, DOCTOR, PRIEST

Famous American General Becomes a Priest.

Father William Olmsted, now a priest of the Order of the Holy Cross, with headquarters at Notre Dame, Indiana, is now in New York, the guest of the pastor of St. Andrew's church, of that city. The distinguished clergyman will celebrate the holy sacrifice of the mass to-morrow morning at St. Andrew's, and former friends who know him as general during the Civil war and later as a member of the medical profession will be present on the occasion to greet him and be blessed by his sacred ministrations.

Father Olmsted is a native of Albany, having been born at the old family residence on Division street, between Green and Pearl streets, over sixty-six years ago. His father afterwards erected the commodious building, 100 Hudson avenue, where the boyhood of the future general, physician and priest were spent. The boy was a favorite of the late Cardinal McCloskey, Bishops Hughes and Wadham, who were frequent visitors at the Olmsted homestead away back in the fifties.

It is expected that during the visit of Father Olmsted, East, he will visit the city of his birth for the purpose of celebrating the divine mysteries of the mass which will likely be offered at the Cathedral, which edifice the venerable priest often visited in his boyhood before his conversion to the church. Many Alabamians will no doubt beglad to be present at the ceremonies.

The New York Sun commenting on Father Olmsted's visit to the metropolis has the following to say:

"The Rev. William Olmsted, a man of somewhat remarkable history, will celebrate mass on Sunday next in St. Andrew's Roman Catholic church at Duane street and City Hall place. Father Olmsted was known until a few months ago, as Dr. Olmsted, and before that as Gen. Olmsted. He fought through the Civil war and was promoted Brigadier-General. He has traveled around the world twice. He was a division superintendent of the New York Central Railroad at one time, again a physician, at another time a surgeon on a Western railroad. He has fought the Indians and has done missionary work among them; finally he became a Catholic priest. He has made a success of everything he has undertaken."

Father Olmsted is almost six feet in height and he has clear-cut features and white hair. His ancestors settled in the United States in 1632. He is an orator, but he has made up his mind to remain in quietude. He came to New York to spend the holidays as the guest of the pastor of St. Andrew's.

Father Olmsted was born in New York State sixty-six years ago, and as a youth he studied civil engineering in Troy. In 1861 he went to the war as a Captain in the Second Infantry Regiment of New York Volunteers. In different capacities he fought in many battles and he was in all of the battles in which the Army of the Potomac took part from Petersburg to the surrender of Lee. After his regiment was mustered out he became a student of medicine and later was connected as a physician with the Union Pacific, the Denver and Rio Grande, and the Fort Worth and Texas railroads. In 1881 he dropped business and studied for the priesthood. He was ordained on Feb. 8 of this year at Notre Dame, Ind. He is a member of the G.A.R., the Loyal Legion, the Empire State Society of the Sons of the American Revolution, and of the Society of Colonial Wars.

"Father Olmsted said, that life was too short for a man to do any talking about himself."

SECRET OF GERMAN CATHOLIC PROGRESS.

In his lecture at the Australian Catholic Congress, Very Rev. Father Tracy, V.G., thus explained the secret of success which has enabled the Catholics to secure such a strong position in Germany. A few years ago, when travelling through America on a long trial journey from Salt Lake City to Chicago, he fell in with a very interesting companion, a German Catholic, a highly informed and most intelligent man.

And speaking of the triumph of religion in the German Empire, especially of recent years, the German said with great earnestness and emphasis:

"If the Catholic Church in my country can boast of its increase in perfect organization, in numerical strength and Christian education under God in man, due to the circulation and influence of the Catholic press and books, along the valley of the Rhine, where was situated my ancestral home, and as I am aware, forward to with an anxiety an ex-in every parish in Germany, the arrival of the weekly Catholic paper in every Catholic household was looked forward to if a long-absent member of the family were returning home."

Father Tracy's exclamation: "Would that the same could be said of every Catholic home" will, we are sure, be echoed by those in Europe who read the statement of his German travelling companion.

THE FRENCH CLERGY

It is very comforting to read in The Catholic Champion (Protestant Episcopalian) of December, which our readers, perhaps, do not know is not a Roman Catholic Champion, such a sympathetic account of the French clergy and, incidentally, such a vindication of the Catholicity of the people. The article is by W. T. Alston, and was written for The Church Review.

The French Government, he tells us, rules the temporalties of the Church with an iron hand. The same iron hand, by the way, is continually closing in as much of those coveted temporalities as it conveniently can, without giving too much of a shock to the world's feelings. If the world can be credited with any such weakness avert the Church.

It pays salaries to the Bishops of between $750 and $2,000 from which princely income they are honorably supposed to defray their household and travelling expenses. As this money comes from expropriated church property, and does not belong to the state at all, and never did, the generosity is quite distressing. The parish priests receive between $200 and $250 a year, but a much greater number receive nothing whatever. They are supported by the people, and that fact ought to close the lips of those who are continually boasting of the "voluntary system" as if it were peculiar to countries like our own. Evidently the people there are not backward in fulfilling their duty.

We are glad to hear from The Champion that "the French priests as a body deserve the admiration of the Christian world. Their wonderful self-devotion, their virtuous and blameless lives in the face of terrible odds and opposition, and poverty proclaim them to be the most apostolic clergy in the world." It is strange to learn from such a source that this condition of things "he suspects is dying in great measure to the compulsory retreats of ten days which are the rule in all dioceses." He is right. That certainly is the explanation of it, and the extension of the retreats to ten days may be an inspiration to some as well as a revelation.

It is not surprising, therefore, to hear that "in spite of the anti-religious press, irreligious education, and hostility of the State, religious vocations are plentiful. Although seminarians are obliged to enter the army, the effect has been, much to the dismay of the government, to increase the influence of the Church among the soldiers rather than to destroy ecclesiastical life, though, as was to be expected, there have been some defections to deism."

This unprejudiced observer gives us good news also of the condition of Catholicity among the people. "Go to any cathedral," he says, "in a religious part of the country, between five and nine in the morning and see the crowded altars and frequent communicants, and listen to the feet of those who come in for a few moments to say a prayer before they begin their day's work, and you will be convinced of the vigor of their Catholic life."

"The Church in France is quite awake to her mission, and does not propose to continue indefinitely the starved and strangled condition bequeathed to her by the revolution. That of which the revolution has robbed her, that which the State refuses to recognize, she is endeavoring gradually to restore to herself, on her own account, and on her own responsibility." Most of us forgot the awful disaster that fell upon the Church there only a hundred years ago, and we are too impatient about their slowness in organizing.

Notes of the Far-Famed Giant's Causeway and the Lakes of Killarney.

True to my promise, in this present article I am going to attempt to give the readers of the Catholic Register some faint idea of the unrivalled natural beauty of the world-famed Giant's Causeway, a monumental product of nature which has challenged the attention and admiration of travellers from all land from time immemorial. Things that art and skill have fashioned into objects of unique beauty and design attract and win our praise, but when we stand in the presence of wondrous formations bearing the impress of man's handwork, and yet we know that mortal hands had no act or part in their formation, we experience a feeling of awe which we cannot account for nor adequately express in words.

If we are returning to our native land, from Canada or the United States, and pursuing our way towards the main object of our visit, namely, the Giants' Causeway, let us skip the intervening spaces that lie between, and imagine ourselves in the very presence of the wondrous formation to whose base we are climbing by a rudely fashioned pathway which is fearless and without protection, so much so that people of nervous temperament almost shudder on looking into the chasms below. Despite the inconvenience we hear no complaints to realize that we are nearing the object that we have read so much about, and the sight of which has thrilled visitors from all countries. As you gaze at the three miles of basaltic columns, which are respectively designated the middle, the little, and the grand Causeway; you are directly face to face with the famous structure in bulk, and as you look in wonderment on the historic object you are irresistibly drawn closer to it and by some mysterious impulse you are constrained to examine in detail its huge columns and pillars, said to comprise some 40,000 in all, standing perpendicularly, it having for the greater part six or seven sides, each while only a few have four and eight sides, and a single one, in the whole group, of three sides. The mystified onlooker is puzzled to conceive how the enormous basaltic columns, which seem to rise abruptly from the sea could have been so securely placed upon their base in such regularity and symmetrical form, and so exactly proportioned as to suggest well matured scientific plans and speculations wrought out by some of the foremost scientists of the age.

As you examine closer you see that, at certain intervals, the columns are disjointed, the curved portion of one section fitting admirably into the concave part of the next, again suggesting uniformity of design and method. How deep the base of the columns penetrate into the earth, and how far they extend landward, and seawards, seems so far to be unknown. The surface, however, is not uniform, as some of the columns are higher, some lower, while some stretch landward as far as the nose of the semi-circular hillsides and thus are swallowed up and lost to human sight in the sea. The puzzle seems to increase the longer you study the wonderful combinations and the apparent skillful artistic conceptions and plans, and as you rack your brain for some plausible explanation or theory, of your own to account for a work that looks exactly like the effort of human ingenuity, you fall completely to evolve anything feasible or satisfactory, and as a pleasing substitute you readily surrender your opinions to the legends and ancient tales which connect the celebrated Irish Giant, Fin McCool, with the construction of the Causeway. Every school boy knows the history of this renowned hero, who was the mightiest and bravest man of his country and race. His chairmanship had remained long undisputed till a Scotch giant dared to oppose him and set himself up as his match in any sort of contest where valor and strength showed to advantage. On hearing this, Fin's Irish blood warmed over to the boiling point, and he forthwith challenged the Scotch pretender to mortal combat; it was to be a veritable "fight to a finish," and as the Scotch giant had a dislike for wet feet in crossing the channel, Fin at once removed the difficulty by building the Causeway as a safe and dry mode of transit for his opponent. The historical record is not explicit as to the outcome, nor is it even verified that the hostile meeting ever occurred; but if sheer imagination can carry us the length of believing that victory resulted with Fin McCool for his prowess was acknowledged throughout the Kingdoms, and in many famous fields, he vindicated his character as being one of the greatest champions Ireland had produced.

CREATED A DUCHESS.

The Pope has created Mme. Antonia de Alvarado Colls, the widow of the late Minister of Mexico to France, a Duchess in recognition of her magnificent gifts to the Church, one of them being a splendid residence in Paris for the Papal Nuncio. Mme. Alvarado has recently given her husband's valuable collection of books to the National Library of Mexico. Senator Alvarado left his great residence and grounds in Cuernavaca, a suburb of this city, for a hospital.

ALWAYS ON HAND.—Mr. Thomas H. Porter, Lower Ireland, P.Q., writes: "My son, 18 months old, had croup so bad that, nothing gave him relief until a neighbor brought me some of Dr. Thomas' Eclectic Oint. which I gave him, and in six hours he was cured. It is the best medicine I ever used, and I would not be without a bottle of it in my house."

GUARDIAN LITTLE HER.—Tina McLeod, Sevren Bridge, writes: "I owe a debt of gratitude to Dr. Thomas' Eclectic Oint. for curing me of a severe cold that troubled me nearly all last winter. In order to give a quietus to a hacking cough, take a dose of Dr. Thomas' Eclectic Oint. three or four times a day, or often if the cough spells render it necessary."
