MISSIONARY LIFE AMONG THE CANNIBALS.—The life of our pioneer missionary Dr. Geddie, written by Dr. Patterson, and just issued from the press is a most interesting and instructive book. It is a store-house of information with regard to the Islands of the south seas. It vividly describes their physical formation, their characteristics and their scenery where every prospect pleases. Turning to the darker side of the picture, their inhabitants only vile, it no less vividly pictures heathenism and in terse and simple story tells of their coming out of darkness to light from the first germ of the Mission at home through the opposition and discouragements of its earliest days, through the toilsome but triumphant victories of later years, to the death of him who now sleeps in the Geelong cemetery, until, his work done, Dr. Geddie rested from his labors.

The first gallon of sweet cider bought for family use in the first step taken towards making a drunken household; for before the gallon is gone there is a looking for it, and another is purchased; but every day it gets more and more sour, stronger, more alcoholic, and before one knows it is felt to be a need; soon hard cider is in daily use, and when the cider season is over, a necessity is felt for a substitute; then the way is steadily downwards to a drunkard's grave.

ALCOHOL IN HOSPITALS.—Dr. Webster who has banished alcohol from St. George's Infirmary, London, with a saving of more than £500 a year, says: "So far no bad results have been manifested; on the contrary, several good ones are apparent." It is clear from many such experiments that all the money expended for beer, wine and spirits in all the hospitals and work-houses in the country is simply wasted. Paupers and patients would be better without it.—Herald of Health.

It is the habitual thought that frames itself into our life. It affects us; even more than our intimate social relations do. Our confidential friends have not much to do in shaping our lives as the thoughts have which we harbor.—J. W. Teal.
