" At eight o'clock on Saturday amorning she weighed anchor from Sandy Hook, discharged the pilot at nine, and with a fair wind proceeded to sea. By midnight the wind blew stiffy with rather a heavy sea; sounded the pu no and found all dry. At two a.m., the officer on duty observed that the vessel did not answer her helm readily, added to which she lay over more than usual, with a strange uneasy motion; so much so that he very poudentry arouse I too captain and a I hands. --At this entical juncture the pumps showed five feet of water, and on an even keel they gave fourteen feet in the hold, with every appearance of the vessel going down by the stern. To avoid a rush, the passengers were not on'y kept in ignorance of the danger, but no one under any pretence was admitted on deak, although anticipating the fearful struggie for for life; a I the boats and life preservers were in readiness, besides a number of loose spars with ropes rove into them.

At three a.m., the wind increast, huge waves broke over the bulwarks, washing every-thing that was loos about the Jeck, but not one of the crow disobeyed orders or a vivid flash of electric fluid struck the Life, and Upper Cama'a.

This was with great difficulty stopped sufficiently to reach this port. The passengers were then admitted to the deck, and rendered what assistance the Garter-Goes. they could. The teturn trip was accomplished by moon on Monday. STRANGE METEOR.

A correspondent of the Times, under date Burnham, mai Maidenhead, September 3, writes to say- 'Having been kept up late last night, we strolled out for a few minutes previous to retiring to rest, a little before one o'clock. We were walking on an open common of considerable extent, beneath a britlant moonlight and entirely cloudless sky, in the neighbourhood of Maiderhead, when our attention was suddenly and simultaneous attracted by a burst of buildiant light in the south-west quarter of the heavers. At first a star seemed to both of us to enlarge and expand rapidly, till it reached about the magnitude of the moon as she appears to ou sight; it then shot downwards in a full-stream of yellow light. which was changed first into a red, and finally into a vivid green, when it d suppeared, leaving no traces of itself behind.
