

for a Corporation in most points, yet 'we cannot forbear praising the force of his language, the chastity of his illustrations, and the evident profundity of his reading, we can easily perceive he is a man of no ordinary talent, that the Pamphlet was not the work of much labour, and that if he had more elaborately considered the subject in all probability his position would have been more speciously supported.

Probably for those readers who have not thought much on the subjects in this article we have been too concise, we have pointedly rejected illustrations ; but if our several reflections are fairly considered we have no doubt our author who indicates in his work so much perspicacity, will candidly join our other readers in acknowledging their justice.
