SAYS IT MAY BE A SUBJECT OF INQUIRY. Capt. Smith of Schooner Willena Gertrude Accuses Light-house Crew of Negligence in Connection With Witch Hazel Tragedy—Tells of Difficulty in Saving Men.

Friday, Nov. 18. Bringing the news that the failure of the crew at the southwest breakwater light at New Haven to rescue Capt. Britt, Andrew Miller and Thomas Masten, of the schooner Witch Hazel, may be the subject of inquiry, Capt. W. H. Smith, of the three-masted schooner Willena Gertrude, who succeeded in saving the lives of two of the crew, arrived at the light house at the city with his vessel, Thursday night. The schooner will discharge a cargo of coal here and will load again for the West Indies. Capt. Smith had been night for Parrabro to recuperate, he having contracted a heavy cold in the brave rescue of the Miller brothers on Sunday night last. Captain Smith said yesterday that his vessel was safely anchored in the side of the breakwater on which the ill-fated Witch Hazel struck, and he could see the survivors struggling in the rigging. At the end of the breakwater, not more than 100 yards from the wreck, is a lighthouse with a keeper and assistant, always on watch and at this time, Captain Smith says, a crew of six men had landed and were engaged in the house during the storm with a yawl drawn up on the breakwater. Seeing that the life-saving crew were taking no action, Captain Smith sent his mate, Walter Elliott, the second mate, and Walter Elliott, the second mate, he set off from his vessel in a 15-foot boat lowered from the deck, as the large ship's crew was out of repair.

THE CRITIC ON THE HEARTH.

From the London Evening Standard. I know a mellow, worthy pair. Who many a wedding year have seen. And stoutly faced their wear and tear. Learning to bear things with forbear. And strike love's golden mean. Yet 'twixt these two one troublesome cloud Has spread, that time falls to disperse. And, spite of all forbearance vowed, As with undying force endowed, The thing gets worse and worse. One way she has to be content. Without an inward groan. The same in him has come to be. For her a source of misery. It wears her to the bone. They put their tempers out of gear. Yet still pursue their diling way. Each to the other still is dear. But six months out of every year. They do it every day. Yet by no deadly sin they're racked. And need to seek such undying fire. Nay, they are proud of this one fact. Which is the futile way, in fact. That each will poke the fire.
