

Down the Street. Down the street, down the street, The children come with skipping feet, Filling the air of the midsummer day With their merry shouts of laughter and Little they think, and less they care, That the path they tread, so smooth and fair, Leads on, still onward, till they shall stand On the shore of the shadowy " Unknown Land.

Down the street, down the street, The tall steed comes with prancing feet ; Daintily stepping, as proud to bear The graceful form of his rider fair. Fair, and youthful, and gay is she ; Her white plumes toss on the breezes free, Yet the gems that flash from her slender hand Are lighting her course to the "Unknown Land."

Down the street, down the street, An old man comes with loitering feet ; Heavily throbs the pulse, and slow ; The sands of life are running low ; his wife. His eyes are dimmed with frequent tears. His form is bowed with the weight of years. And he longs to join with his household hand That has passed before to the " Unknown Land." give-God holds us in his hand.'
