trout fishing on one of the upper tributaries of the Beaverkill, and had clambered down into a deep rayine to get at a tempting pool at the foot of the fall, where I was sure my casts would be rewarded by the killing of some big trout. I was not mistaken as to that. I had landed four trout, the smallest one eighteen inches long, and sat down to 'rest the pool.' Both sides of the ravine were perpendicular walls of rock, probably twenty-five feet high. The summit of the wall on the side of the creek opposite to me sloped back gradually from its edge for several feet to a heavy growth of pine.

In de next place, I hev learned from sad experience dat sich honeyed work of the wall on the side of the ravine were perpendicular walls of rock, probably twenty-five feet high. The summit of the wall on the side of the creek opposite to me sloped back gradually from its edge for several feet to a heavy growth of pine.

for soveral feet to a heavy growth of pine.

"As I was sitting at the bottom of the ravine I happened to glance up to the top of the rocks opposite me, and saw a hen pheasant accompanied by her newly hatched brood come out of the pines and scratch and peck her way along the sloping open space, hunting food for her young, which clustered closely about her. The pheasant came near the edge of the precipice, and it seemed to me that she was placing her brood in a most dangerous position, when she turned as if to walk back with them to the pines. The instant she turned something like a shadow fiitted across the top of the ravine, and half a second later I saw an the rocks, but his effort was in vain, and he came crashing down the face of the precipice, still holding the luckless pheasant in his jaws. He fell with a crash in the water, and lay motionless at the edge of the pool.

"I supposed that the animal had been watching the pheasant from the bushes on top of the rocks opposite where the bird had appeared with her brood, and at his opportunity had leaped across to seize her, but had misjudged the distance and fallen short, with the result so fatal to him.

"The whirl of the water brought the wildeat around in a short time to the side where I was standing, and as I was bending down to examine him I saw a man with a gun scrambling down the rocks. The man soon reached my side, and I then learned that he had shot the wildeat as the an-down the rocks. The man soon reached my side, and I then learned that he had shot the wildcat as the animal was flying across the chasm upon his prey. Sure enough, just at the base of the animal's brain was the hole made by the rifle ball. The hunter had been following the wildcat for some time, and had lost track of him, but came near the edge of the ravine in time to see him make his leap and follow him with the bullet. It was that which had stopped the animal short in the tremendous leap it had calculated on or it would have cleared the space with safety and doubtless with ease. The wildcat was in reality almost in his death throes when he struck the pheasant, which he clung to with the clutch of death, and still held in his mouth when we dragged him out of the water. We measured the wildcat had made his death leap. The measurement was forty-three feet."—New York Sun.

One may, perhaps, presume so far upon old acquaintanceship as to indulge occasionally in a mild practical joke, but to attempt familiarity with strangers is "another pair of sleeves." A city gamin was wont to play rather roughly with a good natured bull dog, owned by a shopkeeper of the neighborhood. One day the boy was waking with a crony, when he saw the dog approaching.
"Hil there's Towse!" he cried. "Now see me head him off."

He stepped in front of the dog, with arms extended, and partially blocked the passage. The animal looked surprised, stopped, and evidently considered within himself what would be best do.

prised, scopped, and evidently considered within himself what would be best do.

"I never knew him to act like that," said the joker. "He allers lays down on his back and rolls. Guess I'll stir him up a little!"

With that he sprang at the dog, and caught him by the ears, and began pulling him about.

Towse was evidently amazed, but he proved equal to the occasion. Fastening his teeth in the boy's trousers, in startling nearness to an expanse of bare knee, he held on like a vise.

Just at that moment the boy caught sight of an unfamiliar spot of white on the animal's head, and dropped his hold to take at once to his heels, leaving a goodly portion of his woolen cloth in the creature's mouth.

"Run, Patsy, run!" he shouted to his chum. "He's gone and turned hisself into another dog!"—Youth's Companion.

A Fair Understanding.

A woman in the near vicinity of 45 and weighing within a pound of 180 occupied a seat on the train from Toledo the other day in company with a scared looking young man who probably voted last fall for the first time. As they mentioned Detroit and the fact that they were going to stop here, a citiman who had a seat ahead turned around and said he would be glad to give them any information he possessed.

"Look-a-here," said the woman in answer, "I want a fair understanding with you at the outset. Who do you suppose this young man is?"
