Brutal Murder

at Glace Bay.

BODY OF DANIEL BEATON RADLI
BATTERED—COMPLICATED MYSTERY.

Sydney Aug. 11.—Mystery of the most complicated kind surrounds the murder of Daniel H. Beaton, 31, whose mangled body was found by an auto party, lying face downward on South Street, Glace Bay, at 1.15 this morning.

The deceased earlier in the night had been engaged in a row at the Stirling, the negro quarter of the town, to which the police had to be called, but he escaped from the encounter without serious injury, and started for home, accompanied by his brother, William, and a brother-in-law.

His movements have been traced from the time he left the Stirling until he crossed the big bridge, but from that time on all is confusion. The police are vigorously investigating the case, but they are at loss to know whether he was pursued and killed by those who attacked him at Stirling, whether he was killed by some other person, or whether he was run over by an automobile.

Up to the present the developments point to a case of brutal murder. Robbery was apparently not the motive, as a purse containing $219 was found not far from the body.

The Facts to Date.

The facts as gleaned by the police up to the present time, are as follows:

About midnight, the police were called to quell a fight at the Stirling. Officers Dan K. McDonnell and William McDonald responded, and on arrival found that the row had subsided. There were present among others Dan H. Beaton, the deceased, his brother, William, and Fred Stillman, a brother-in-law of theirs.

They told the police that Dan had been severely beaten by a gang. The officers offered to take them home in a car, but they decided to walk to South Street, about a mile away.

This they did. When about fifty yards beyond the bridge on Commercial street, the brother-in-law declared he had gone far enough and that he was going back home to Number Two. He turned about and went back.

Where the other two men went the police do not know.

Jazz Night.

To-night all roads lead to the C.C.C. Hall, where the Jazzola Orchestra plays at the dance in honor of the visiting Canadian Ball players. No lover of dancing should miss this opportunity of doing homage to the visitors and at the same time of hearing the most up-to-date dance-music played in the broadest manner by the new Orchestra.
