Lloyd Georgian, the National Liberals will retaliate, and the fight would really be a "question of proceeding actually with the old Coalition agreement," as one party manager put it to the newspaper correspondents. He said, "Lloyd George's whole case, as he has admitted himself, is that party war is not the thing for the country at this time. There is no pact, that is true, but we have been following the same lines as before, nominating only one hundred and sixty-five canseats and return to the Commons with a group sufficiently numerous to won't stand a raid upon that group.
