It is an exaggeration to say that the pilot service of this country is one of the mainstays of Britain's mercantile Marine, for without the assistance of these skilful seamen the vessels upon which our prosperity depends would be unable to go into or out of port.

Like the mercantile marine itself, he pilot service has grown from a ody of daring adventurers into a band of highly trained and organized men. To-day, from Plymouth to the Clyde, and from the Thames to the Forth, never a ship arrives or departs but is guided by the pilot on board.
