

There is however an institution amongst them, including I think all their members, which might advantageously be employed to disseminate the requisite information; I mean that of Clerical Societies, which brings the clergy together periodically at each other's residences. The secretary of each of these societies might be made the depository of such practical works as any friend to the Canadian Church might be disposed to supply; and from what I have seen of the Canadian clergy, I am sure that nothing of the kind would be lost upon them. Their means are for the most part limited, but they are intelligent churchmen; zealous in pursuit of everything, internal and external, by which the honour of the Church can be upheld, and supported most cordially in their views and wishes by their brethren of the laity. I feel confident, therefore, that whatever means of information they acquire will be turned to account, and that speedily.

FINIS.