

The Missionary Review of the World describes South America as "Earth's darkest land."

One called Jesus, whom we say we love and profess to serve, said: "Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature."

Diagram showing the average parish of each missionary working in South America, compared with that of missionaries working in other lands and at home.

It will be seen that the spiritual needs of South America exceed those of even such lands as Japan and India. Were the population of South America equally divided among its preachers, every Protestant missionary would have a parish of 227,000 souls, while at home he would only have 800.

* From "The Neglected Continent."