Comparison is the only method by which progress may be judged, and a little comparison with conditions a decade ago will best serve to show how Hamilton has grown. In 1903 a summer carnival was held. It was attended by thousands of Hamiltonians who had gone to other places to seek positions. Many of these, doubtless, will return this summer, and if they have not visited Hamilton in the interval they will see great changes, especially in the outlying districts. At that time the city's population was slightly less than 55,000, and its growth was comparatively slow during the following seven years, the 1910 census showing it to be 70,000. In the last three years it has jumped to 88,918, and it is confidently believed it will be 100,000 when the assessors announce their figures in October. CROWELL BROS.

THE WINTER TREK.

As surely as times change and old things give way to new, there is a present-day phase of western Caradian life that a few years from new will have ceased to be, says Aubrey Fullerton in The Saturday Globe. It is a picturesque thing—the winter trek to Grande Prairie—and full of human interest. When the railroads get up north it will be seen no more as seen to-day; and they are already heading northward. But as yet the trail is the only way, the long, hard way, of the men who seek northern homes, and over it has been going, for way, of the men who seek northern homes, and over it has been going, for the past three years, a movement that is more significant, with less of mystery and tragedy, than that of the Klondike trail of fifteen years ago.

This moving of the settlers over the northern trails, with families and stock, and miscellaneous possessions, is one of the most realistic phases of Canadian immigration. It has a look of the domestic, combined with the adventurous. It suggests both tediousness and good fun. It is distinctive of the country, and very creditable to the spirit of the folk who journey thus. There's nothing else in Canada qutte like it.

From Edson, which is the new railway town west of Edmonton, to Grande Prairie City, is a journey of from ten to fifteen days. How much longer or shorter a time one is om the road depends upon where his homestead is located. But two weeks of such traveling will necessitate a willingness to conform to circumstances and the kind of spirit that Sam Weller had. Otherwise it won't be happy going at all. It is sleighriding and picnicking of a protracted kind, combined with a narrowness of space that almost equals that of a Pullman sleeping-car.

The caboosee, or little houses on sleds, in which the settlers move their Pullman sleeping-car.

The cabooses, or little houses on sleds, in which the settlers move their families over the trail are cosy, notwithstanding their narrow limits. When the weather is not too cold it is possible to have really good times in a caboose. In Edmonton one frequently sees a party preparing to set out, and through the open flaps of the house-on-sleds one catches cheerful glimpses of a traveling family and its domestic strangements. Every inch of space is utilized to good effect, and in this little house, walled sometimes with boards, sometimes weeks earlier and made record time in getting away. The trek will go on, however, well into the spring. Happily, the north freezes its rivers and mudholes hard and solid, and even when they become sticky atop there is firm enough a bottom to get safely over, if one does not wait too long. Tourists are more disposed to comply with the regulations regarding fishing licenses than ever before on account of the expensive lessons some have been taught by way of paying penalties, says the report.

In the course of the conversation he said that one of the reasons. In the course of the conversation he said that one of the reasons why he judged that his man was not what he had represented himself to be and that he was very hard up was the fact that the fellow in question had worn the same suit from the first time he came to town. The surface of this harbor of the hills was rough with outeropping rock. lop, until, half a mile from the gate, they came upon a clearing and a low, red roofed bungalow.
"Your house, sir." and Oscar swung himself down at the steps of a broad veranda. He led the horses away to a barn beyond the house, while Armitage surveyed the landscape. The bungalow stood on a rough knoll and was so placed as to afford a splendid view of a wide fe-gion. Armitage traversed the long veranda, studying the landscape and delighting in the far stretching pine cov-ered barricade of hills. He was arous-ed by Oscar, who appeared carrying "There shall be breakfast," said the Armitage slapped his thigh sharply, so that his horse started.

"Yes; you are probably right, Oscar. I have heard of the place. And those houses that lie beyond there in the valley belong to gentlemen of taste and leisure who drink the waters and ride horses and play the foolish game you describe with little white brills."

"I could not fell it better," responded Oscar, who had dismouthed, like a good trooper, to rest his horse.

"And our place—is it below there?" demanded Armitage.

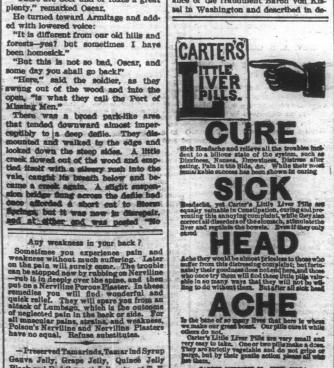

"It is not sir. It lies to the west. But a man may come here when he is came by express is there. A wagon goes with the place, and I brought the things up yesterday. There is a show-"It is not sir. Oscar unstraped the trunks and ther stood at attention in the door. He had expected Armitage to condemn the place in bitter language, but the proprietor of the abandoned hunting preserve was in excellent spirits and

"The place was built by fools," dehat fools build houses and wise men live in them. You see where that leaves us, Oscar. Let us be cheerful?'
He tried the shower and changed his raiment, while Oscar prepared coffee and laid a cloth on the long table be fore the fire. When Armitage appeared coffee steamed in the tin pot in which It had been made. Bacon, eggs and toast were further offered.

"You have done excellently well, Os-car. Go get your own breakfast." Armitage dropped a lump of sugar into his coffee cup and surveyed the room A large map of Virginia and a series of hunting prints hung on the untinted walls, and there were racks for guns, and a work bench at one end of the three-year-old magazines and a variety of pipes remained on the shelf above the fireplace. The house offered possi-bilities of meager comfort, and that was about all. Armitage remembered what the agent through whom he had made the purchase had said—that the place had proved too isolated for even a hunting preserve and that its only value was in the timber. He was satisfied with his bargain and would not set up a lumber mill yet awhile. He lighted a cigar and settled himself in an easy chair before the fire, glad of the luxury of peace and quiet after his circuitous journey and the tumuit of doubt and question that had shaken

He slit the wrapper of the Washing ton newspaper that Oscar had brought from the mountain postoffice and scar ned the headlines. He read with car a dispatch from London that purported to reflect the sentiment of the conti-nental capitals toward Charles Louis, the new emperor-king of Austria-Hunthe new emperor-king of Austria-Hun-gary, and the paper dropped upon his knees, and he stared into the fire. Then he picked up a paper of earlier date and read all the foreign dispatches and the news of Washington. He was about to loss the paper aside when his eyes fell upon a boldly headlined arti-cle that cause his heart to throb fercely. It recited the sudden reappearance of the fraudulent Baron von Kissel in Washington and described in de lantic, that Baron von Kissel, under a new pseudouym and with even more daring effrontery, had within a fortnight sought to intrench himself in the most exclusive circles of Washington. Armitray's eigar slipped from his fingers and fell upon the brick hearth as he read:

"The boldness of this clever adventurer is said to have reached a climax in this city within a few days. He had, under the name of Armitrag, palmed himself off upon members of one of the most distinguished families of the capital, whom he had met one of the most distinguished families of the capital, whom he had met abroad during the winter. A young gentieman of this family, who, it will suffice to say, bears a commission and title from the Amèrican government, entertained a small company of triends at a Washington club only a few nights ago, and this plausible adventurer was among the guests. He was recognized at once by one of the foreigners present, who, out of consideration for the heat and fellow meets held his tongue, but it is understood that this gentleman sought Armitage presents and warned him to heave

Armitage rose, dropped the paper into the fire, and, with his elbow resting on the mantel shelf, watched it burn. He laughed suddenly and fixed about, his back to the flames. Oscar
