

AGRICULTURE

From The London and Lancashire Fire and Life Insurance Company

It would seem from various experiments that the more the soil is worked, the more it yields. It is not, however, the mere mechanical action of the plow that produces this result. It is the chemical action of the soil, which is affected by the plow. The plow not only breaks up the soil, but it also brings to the surface the organic matter which has accumulated in the lower layers. This organic matter, when brought to the surface, is decomposed and its constituents are made available to the plants. The plow, therefore, acts as a fertilizer, and its use is essential to the success of the farmer.
