THE DESIRE TO

Persons Dull to the Appreciation of Chance for Pleasure.

[From t'e Interior.] It is not alone the children who ap-

but also grown people whose develop-ment seems to have been arrested, and after the passage of the years they have the child's dependence and insista kindred place. Further notice will, ence in claiming protection from the ills of life, and a providing of its plea-

A reason is generally offered in accounting for these grown-up children, that they were spoiled in early years, but the fact is—there is generally an inherent selfishness that demands all, and gives nothing, in the one who must be constantly amused. And then there are weak natures never growing beyond the pleasure of the small things. There are mothers who never, in a sense, lead the children from the nursery, and who shut them away from the development of self-reliance providing successive interests and ready-made pleasures.

"What shall I do next that I may have a good time?" asked a languid, spiritless girl of ten of a careworn mother.

"Go and ask Jane to leave her sewing for awhile and amuse you," was the reply. And the sewing-woman was called from her work, and spent an hour in doing her best to brighten the spirits and awaken the interest of a mere child, whose faculties seemed already jaded.

What could be expected of the after years of a girl who must be amused constantly, and yet is so lacking in personal resources that even the clue must be furnished her! Something is wrong at center with an age that must call in the caterer to make up courses for entertainment for the senses.

Better belong to the childlike class that is "pleased with a rattle, tickled with a straw," than to the numbers who are dull towards the appreciation and recognition of chance for pleasure

There are children among the grown ups, who never in all their lives, had their ability to find amusement notwho find their pleasure through make-believes, making an old cast-away pan serve as a drum, to the music of which CONSCIOUSNESS discover the glint of God's sunshine in enough to create a joy with close-athand material.

preciative ones. They push themselves doings and their manners, as they in-sistently declare their purpose to be amused, furnish the subjects for the humorous columns of the periodicals, and so the amusement is passed on.

There is a class which amuses itself directly at the expense of others. It is composed of those who pride themselves upon their wit. Rapartee, and sharp little turns that have reference to another, are a sort of revel to them. Bringing into notice the foibles and peculiarities of even a friend is not beneath their purpose to pose as wits. But retribution in the form of the loss of friends, and the shunning of them by acquaintances is sure to overtake them, and the faculty for perceiving the ludicrous, becoming at last weakened through over-work. degenerates into caricature, or positive silliness. It does not need a long experience to show us that those who surrender themselves to the desire for amuse-ment miss its realization. The everyday duties, the close-at-hand service, the longing to be worthy of the gift of life, while driving from the mind the unworthy aim towards getting a good time out of the world, will instead supply that peculiar, broad, varied interest, which furnishes happiness, including that lower or der of satisfaction named amusement.

peal in their helplessness to caretakers, Dr. John K. Mitchel Condemns the Practic of Talking About One's Ailments.

If no better reason can be found, a decent consideration for the comfort of others should prevent one's talking of ailments. Besides being bad manners, the subject is wholly without interest for any but the speaker; the hearer only listens more or less perfunctorily in hopes presently to seize the chance of telling her own melancholy condition. Besides, to talk of ills, mental or bodily, helps to fix them in the mind, to intensify them-and it is all too apt to suggest the exaggeration of them in order to make a good round atale. Moreover, if you talk about them too much or too often even the long-suffering physician may grow tired of being battered with symptoms whose catalogue he has heard recited a hundred times over, and thus the very means taken to impress them will bring about its own defeat. Still more determined, if you are nervous yourself, should be your stand against letting others talk to you of their ills. Even the healthy are liable to imaginary infection therefrom. A professor in a medical school can always tell you what stage of study the undergraduates have reached by the stories of the lads who come to consult him, quite convinced that they have heart disease, appendicitis or consumption, the malady depending upon the subjects of the most recent lectures. The same effect is constantly seen where the common meeting rooms of a hospital or, sanitarium give opportunity for this interchange; no rules or regulations will stop it, because rules will not lessen the amount of "human nater" in man, or in woman either. The inevitable result is that one presently finds symptoms have been quite successfully swapped, the most needs to watch not only the little ones | nervous and apprehensive patients securing the largest share, but each acquiring a few from the other invalids, according to the individual capacthey march as heroes of a hundred lity for the absorption and reproductattles, but those brave men and wotion of the disorders described. men, simple souls, perhaps, in the eyes of some, but strong enough to stand you should never speak to any one alone, while sweet and sane enough to of your ailments—only that you should select the person and the time. It is certainly true that to tell one's troubles is often a help and a relief; but tell them once, not repeatedly, whether to friend or physician, secure the advice you need, take it if you are able to take advice, which few are not strong enough for, and then hold your tongue, remembering that the most exciting story grows dull by repetition, and that the effect of

A thrice-told tale Vexing the dull ear of a drowsy man is not what you want to produce.

By all means get if you can the honest opinion of a disinterested person rudely against the personality and the peace of unselfish sojurners, and their pay to your symptoms and which of pay to your symptoms and which of them should be better for a little wholesome neglect, but if you ask the same question of each newly-hatched, unfledged acquaintance, the consequence can only be confusion of mind and possibly disaster. Treat your doctor as a doctor; it is not necessary, it is even undesirable, that he should be your friend. Professional understanding and a reasonable amount of imagination will suffice to put him in your place enough, at any rate, for comprehension of "the case." Distrust him if he seems to sympathize too much. Remember that he is seeing perhaps 30 cases or so daily-and think what rags and tatters his feelings would be in if he had to shed tears, even metaphorically, along with all of them. So, if his sympathy is pretended, that should morally disqualify him; if he really feels it in the way in which patients demand it of him, then he will be unfitted for calm judgment. sympathy is that which translates itself in helpful action. There are plenty of cases which need treatment that may be painful, distressing or dangerous. How can a man balance coolly questions of life and death where his affections are involved with the answer? You may recall that no sensible physician will attend his own family, a matter which seems to afford a good deal of amusement to the laity; the reason lies precisely in the fact that where his feelings are concerned, his judgment is very likely to be obscured by them. One might even go farther and say that a physician personally strange to the patient is often all the better judge of what is needed, for this very lack of biasing knowledge.

English Pronunciation.

[Hamilton Herald.] With the laudable object of showing those foolish Canadians who ape what they consider to be the fashionable English pronunciation of their mother The tramp—Yes, 'm. I'm trying the tongue, The Toronto World asserts faith cure now, an' I'd like to git a that the Duke of Cornwall pronounces his English as it is pronounced by an educated Canadian. The statement is Chicago? hardly correct. If you were to converse with the duke casually without knowing who he was, you would at once know from his accent that he was not a native Canadian. It is true he has not the disagreeable lisp and drawl which one notices in the talk of some English exquisites. Perhaps the years he spent in the navy saved him from that misfortune. But his accent is sufficiently English to betray his nationality.

There is, however, much good sense in The World's satire on Canadians who strive to acquire an English ac-cent. The fun of it is that they hardly ever succeed, and in the course of a five minutes' conversation make so many slips that it is easy to detect the sham. Such people should deter-mine which particular English accent they wish to acquire before going to work to acquire it, for there are a good many English accents, and the Canadian aspirant after the best Eng-lish style is always in danger of get-authentic."
