The results of the census are carefully studied for they are the measure of a people's progress or decline. But a census is usually taken only once in ten years, and its lesses ons are often misleading. The time of taking it may be in the midst of a commercial depression as in 1861; or immediately following a bad harvest as in 1871. What false impressions the statistics of Canada for those years have made on the emigrating classes of the old world, it is not difficult to conceive. And the worst of it is, that those impressions have never yet been wholly removed.
