Poetry.

The influence of good survives Our follies and our faults, and all We suffer through our journey here, With many a slip and many a fall, And many a sad, repentant tear, Sorrow, and pain, and care, and wee, Is good disguised, did we but know. Is it not wise that we should bear A sympathy for all mankind? Is it not wise that we should see Of wrong and evil, that the good us were better understood? And thus through enyy, malice, hate, Life's many trials, must we wait;

That all who read may understand, That evil deeds have good behind them, And love the torch with which to them; That noble thoughts have had their birth n most unlikely spots of earth; hat noble deeds may most abound Where least expected to be found;
That life, though hard and full of care,
By love is made divinely fair;
That he who reads these truths aright, Finds good in all, in darkness light

(Eugene Fields in Chicago News.) The little joys and little cares, They come upon us thawares—And life is smiles, or frown it wears.

No banner carried at their head, A hand-clasp at the garden gate, And whisper when the moon is late— And strength is ours to conquer fate.

The foes that tramp unheralded

O trifling acts for weal or woe! The pain would not harass us so, The gladness not as sudden go.

we could draw a freer breath, If we could push aside dread death, And hear untired the words God saith So much to do ere hands are cold

So far to fare ere limbs grow old; So much to say ere story's told, Forget, in all our wanderings, To use love's buoyant, sweeping wings.

And I, yes, I sometimes forget To lure away your care and fret, And kiss the cheeks that tears have wet.

Here let us pledge ourselves anew, Each to the other, open, true— Lest life lose all its morning dew.

Who knows what day we say good-by? When one shall in the chu Agent, Annapolis. Let us cling closer, you and I!

I hate this gossiping about Folks who have gone astray; I always hold my tongue unless
I've something good to say.
Now there's the case of Peter Snell (What, have you never heard?): He had some money left in trust To him, and stole a third. Oh dear! how fast the news did spread Of that poor fellow's fall;
But I just said: 'He's not so bad;
He might have stole it all.'

And when Jane Ann McDonaldson (What, really, don't you know?) She that is Mrs. Jackson now, Ran off with Patsy Rowe, Was but a peddler's lad
(And you had better b'lieve her pa
And ma were awful mad),
Her friends all cried: 'How shocking Have thought it of Jane Ann?'
only said: 'He might have been
A rags and bottle man.'

And young Mulroy, who drinks a pint (Why, surely, you've been told?) Of something strong each day—'tis that That makes him look so old— Has one to take his part. I turn
The sad fact into sport,
When it is mentioned, with, 'A pint When it is mentioned, with, 'A pint
It is better than a quart.'
For I won't gossip—that I won't—
It's never been my way;
I always hold my tongue unless
I've something good to say.
