according to Mrs. Ives, in the misst of plenty.

The French custom of accumulating a dowry for every daughter of a family, no matter how humble, is altogether sound. From the day the child is born the money for the purpose is laid aside, and as she grows she earns money for herself, she herself contributes to it. Then when she marries she has a little money capital of her own, with all the accruing moral and material advantages. That is the proper way, and as civilization and population increase it will be the custom here.—N. Y. Snn.

Gloomy Times Ahead. "Maria," said the capitalist, hoarsely, do you think you could give up this sautiful home and go to live in a cheap beautiful home and go to the midst?"

"Why, John," exclaimed his wife, trembling with apprehension, "what is the matter?"

The broken man laid a document before her, bowed his head, and groaned aloud. It was the bill for the children's new school books.—Chicago Tribune.
