

most commanding. In a very beautiful and suggestive illustration Dr. Jowett recalls the city of Durham as an emblem of the prophet's thought. Through the lower reaches of the city flows the river with the pleasure craft passing up and down. Higher up on the first slopes are the shops and places of trade. Above this is the residential section of the city with the homes of the people. Above the homes is the Castle Hill with its frowning front, while on the highest summit and commanding all, with stately majesty, rises the grand old Cathedral. It is a fitting emblem of the great interests of life. Pleasure is suggested by the river; the highways of trade are representative of gain; the home is the shrine of the family; the castle is symbolic of power; and the Cathedral is significant of God. This is the picture that Micah has in mind. In the latter days the spiritual will be supreme. In God's Utopia it will dominate and shape all our pleasures; it will rule in all our business; it will command and guide our home life; it will determine our use of power. That is the picture of the ideal society. Let us not deceive ourselves. We are not getting near the golden
