VALUE OF FORESTS.

No better example can be found of the way in which forests modify for the better soil and climatic conditions than that afforded by the department of the Landes, France. Little more than a hundred years ago its 2,500,000 acres consisted mainly of shifting sands and pestilential marshes. Now the dapartment is one of the richest, most productive and healthful in the country, and the change has been accomplished thru the agency of the pine forests with which it was planted. These are now of immense extent and provide material for the many industries connected with the wood, charcoal, rosin and turpentine they yield. The climate, once bleak, is now described as mild and balmy, and the thin layer of clay below the sandy surface, once imnervious to water, has been so pierced and loosened by the roots of the trees that natural drainage is easily effected.

The forests are carefully supervised and cropped according to strict rule. Trees destined to "short life" are "bled to death" when thinning out becomes necessary, and as pit props find a ready sale in the English market. The most vigorous of the trees are allowed to grow until they are three feet or so in circumference, and are then lopped When they attain 50 or 60 years of age they are cut down and used for telegraph poles and railway ties. The spread of fire is provided against by limiting each forest to a small area fand protecting it by wide trenches, kept clear of inflammable material. Cultivated in this way, the department of the Landes is likely to maintain its prosperous condition indefinitely.

BRITISH STREET RAILWAYS. Some interesting figures regarding

British street railways under public ownership and operation were furnished by Mr. A. L. C. Fell, chief officer of the London County Council department, in his address as president of the Municipal Tramways Association. There are now 305 street railway undertakings in the United Kingdom, 177 of them belonging to local authorities and 128 to companies and private individuals. As bearing on the matter of fares, the returns quoted showed the great majority of passengers carried paid fares of two cents or under. and company. Order made.

MRS, HUMPHRY WARD ON CANADA

Mrs. Humphry Ward is giving Canada one of the greatest advertisements the nation, as she recognizes it, has yet received. The medium is The Ladies' Home Journal, with a circulation of over a million a month, and the method is a serial story, "Lady Merton," which makes a spectacular trans-continental start. Mrs. Ward is not perhaps quite as familiar with Canadian details as she might be, and readers may get the impression that Cobalt is near Lake Superior and that the C.P. R. runs thru North Bay from Toronto, but such trifles are not vital, and in general the atmosphere and the problems of the country are presented with fidelity. One strong rendering is the picture of the unending flood of immigrants into the exhaustless west, Mrs. Ward manages to carry the aristocratic associations of England into the west in a palace car and the contrast between a Canadian man and an English lord will be a wholesome one for United States readers.
