account, he took with him the bright office boy. By 1909 he had saved up enough money to set up for himself, and he opened a book store in Forty-second Street.

What led him to the book business is not known, but it is likely that since chance had made him an errand boy for a publishing house, it happened to be of books that he picked up the most knowledge. Had he been apprenticed to a builder it is the opinion of his admirers that eventually he would have become a famous architect. One being in the book business his keen brain naturally grasped the truth that there was a fortune to be made buying and selling books cheap and selling them dear. It has never been claimed for him that he was a reader of books, nor even a lover of them, as collectors are lovers. His real love was for race horses, and some years ago he had a stable of thoroughbreds. But he knew books. In twenty years he had attained a mastery of them that many other men less richly endowed, have spent a lifetime without acquiring.

He has also a great memory. When he went to an auction to make a purchase he did not need a note book to tell him of the peculiar attractions of any valuable work that was put up. He knew his history, how often it had been coveted where the price, how many copies were in existence, and how many were likely to come into the market, and also who would buy it from him.

The stroke of luck or genius that made certain the success of Smith was when he opened an office in Wall street. Here his customers would certainly not be men who could not afford to buy a book if it took their fancy, and it was here that Smith became acquainted with Huntington. He was able to convince him that he knew the values of books and received many commissions to act for him. Similar orders came to him from other millionaires in search of a hobby, who were giving the book-collecting business a whirl and perhaps exciting diversions. The first great sale was that of the Hoe library in 1911-12.
It was then that he bought the Gutenberg Bible for $50,000, and the record price at the time. The purchase was for Mr. Huntington. In 1911 he bought the library of Dr. Dwight Church for $100,000, and shortly afterward paid half a million dollars for the library of Beverly Chew, containing some unique copies of early English authors. This collection is now the property of Mr. Huntington.

The London Book Ring.
His next sensational coup was made in London. Mr. Smith said on his return that there existed an English clique of book collectors who were in the habit of keeping prices down, and agreeing among themselves not to bid extravagantly for any one volume. The clique sought to have Smith become a member, but he declined and proceeded to bid whatever he felt like. In three weeks buying he spent half a million dollars and was rarely if ever outbid. Indeed, to be outbid was no common experience of George D. Smith's. It was always assumed that he had made his money in the book business, and that if he wanted a thing he would get it. He made a notable stroke in England when he bought for $1,200,000 the library belonging to the Duke of Devonshire. Later he sold it to Mr. Huntington at a profit of $500,000.
This bears out our theory that Smith made more money out of books than the great Devonshire collection was the "Hamlet" quarto of 1608, and in the judgment of Mr. Smith this was and is the most valuable book in the world.
There are, so far as known, but two copies in existence. We believe in the Messrs. Shakespeare, Chaucer et al. have been vastly entertained by the antics of Messrs. Huntington and Smith.
