The ruin wrought by the Italian fire is shown in this photograph. Shells from the big Italian guns are seen strewn over the ground.

SAILOR WHO DIDN'T UNDERSTAND WOMEN

Married Figurehead of His Dreams in the Flesh, and Paid for It—Bad Predicament.

New York, Nov. 7.—The three retired seamen who sat outside the tobacco store at the foot of Brooklyn Heights yesterday afternoon had nothing but words of disparagement for the wooden Indian who stood with one foot advanced in a deferential and listening attitude beside them. It was the opinion of all three ex-sailors that the Indian was a poor creature.

"He isn't any sort of a figurehead to have," remarked the oldest ex-mariner scornfully. "Now, on ships figureheads always mean something. What does this Indian mean?"

"It's a trade sign," said the proprietor defensively.

"Why don't you have a beautiful maiden in a long flowing robe, shading her eyes as she gazes earnestly up the street?" demanded one of the customers.

The proprietor laughed bitterly. Everyone would mock such an image, he said. Besides, such a maiden was not associated with the supplying of tobacco to an unattractive neighborhood.

"I knew a man who had such a figurehead in front of his shop and he died rich," said the oldest man of the sea with conviction. "He was a mate of mine on the brig Cassowary, which plied between Philadelphia and New York when persons used to make the trip by water full as often as by land. New Jersey mud being what it is and railroads not being thought highly of, this mate of mine stole the figurehead of a Cassowary on a dark night as she lay at a pier here, and all because he was so struck with the type of beauty to which the lady on the bow belonged. She was a pale, slim creature with long tresses and a sort of Empire gown, and many a time he used to say to me, 'That's the very image of the woman I want to marry.' When I'd ask him why he didn't marry her he'd shake his head mournfully and confide to me that he hadn't seen her in the flesh yet."

"One day he said to me, being more melancholy than usual that he'd simply have to do something determined to find a woman like the lady of the Cassowary. That very night with my help he unfasted the figurehead and buoyed it with inflated rubber belts towed it up the river and hid it in a little cove. In the morning there was great consternation about the loss of the figurehead, accompanied by the strongest language I had ever heard our skipper use. But my mate he got the figurehead out of the cove after the hue and cry had quieted a bit and had it wrapped and driven inland. Then he set up the lady in front of his tobacco store."

"There was no statutory in that New Jersey village, and the very best people in town took to my mate at once as the only local patron of one of the fine arts. He soon did a rushing business, considering the size of the place and had to answer a hundred questions a day about his stone lady. He told part of the truth too, how she was his ideal of female beauty; and the women of that town actually encouraged their husbands to buy tobacco of him."

Peter Sharkey, who will be one of a committee named by the Brotherhood of Railway Employees of Canada, to meet the Minister of Labor with a view of having the Industrial Disputes Act extended to include employees of railways, left last evening for Ottawa, accompanied by Mrs. Sharkey. The other members of the committee are, Grand President Mosher, of Halifax and H. L. Swan, of Montreal.

Represents Railway Men.

"No, it wasn't. It was because it was a woman," said the narrator. "You don't understand the sex as I do, Bill. They are all psychological and contrary."
