ENGLISH AS SHE IS "WRIT" IN ST. JOHN

'Twill be Interesting to Learn that "Ferry is RUNNING to Reed's Point" - So Says the Notice.

"Can you tell me, please, where the point is?" This was an inquiry made by a lady yesterday evening. She was interrogating a ruminating rover - not a reporter. It was in Water street where the incident happened. "I am sorry," replied the rover, "but I do not quite know how to answer your question." "Well, sir, I want to go to Carleton, and it says on the door that the point is the place to go to to reach Carleton." Of course, the discerning rover directed the anxious one to Reed's Point, he having read an advertisement in the papers about a little, and temporary change of route occasioned by repairs found to be requisite on the ferry wharf.

FERRY IS RUNNING TO REEDS POINT

The R. R. was carefully perusing the gentle announcement, partly admiring its true simplicity, and partly wondering why some more prominent and intelligible announcement could not be fixed up somewhere, so that all eyes could see that a change in the ferry service had been made, when lo! he received a tap on the shoulder. It was an emphatic tap. The top part of the ad. did it.

"What's the matter with the ferry?" enquired the man with the ladder, who looked like a painter, or some body equally as good. "Can you not see that notice?" "What notice?" queried the painter, who was the rover's fretful half-jointer.

"What notice?" queried the painter, who was the rover's fretful half-jointer. "That one," replied the now trembling ruminating one.

"Oh! that dirty little sheet, fixed on the door, do you mean, boss? Let's have a look through your opera glasses. Yes, I see now, it's the point I've got to go to, is it? But, by gum, if I couldn't get my eight-year-old boy over Carleton, to sling up a better notice than that and get the eleven-year-old 'un to fix it so as people could see it I'd fix myself, ladder, an' all into the harbor."
