

"The teachers feel that in the event which has taken place, the Sabbath School has suffered a loss of no ordinary magnitude. Her presence from time to time at the meetings of the teachers for the study of the lessons, and for the general interests of the school, gave ample proof how deeply she felt the weight of the solemn work in which she was engaged, and the zeal displayed by her during the many years of her connexion with it, brought out, in bold relief, those traits of character for which she was so eminent. Rarely has it fallen to the lot of any Sunday School, to have enjoyed for so many years, the services of one so full of that Christian spirit which kindles as it proceeds, and gains new strength as it contemplates the high and holy work of being engaged in the service of Christ, and advancing the cause of the Divine Redeemer, in connexion with the interests of the young. That she was eminently fitted for this holy work, none can doubt who knew her; and the evenness of her temper, the gentleness of her spirit, and Christian meekness, these increasing in strength day by day, like a steady light, attracted around her for Sabbath instruction, a number who were not connected with the congregation, but who valued her instruction for her own sake, and her Christian example. Her own class, over which she watched with unceasing care, and whose spiritual interests were uppermost in her thoughts, are deprived of an affectionate teacher and faithful guide; and it is not too much to expect that the seed sown for so many years, with earnest prayer for its ripening, will produce, by God's blessing, saving results in the conversion of not a few who were the
