Why, said he, it is only a few years, since the man who went into the woods in the fall, saw no signs of comfort until he came out in the spring. The accommodations were all of the most rude and primitive character, the camps were generally built after the men went into the woods, and were mere protections against the weather, the men laid down at night on some boughs, with such covering as they might happen to bring into the woods with them; the fare was the most common kind, being chiefly pork and fish-none of the present comforts being heard of in those days. It was on the streams that the men suffered most. From long before daylight in the morning until after sundown at night the men drove the lumber down the swollen streams, and often drenched through at night by an accidental tailor, has gone to New York to take lessons bath in the cold water, or by a beating rain, covering of any kind and slept until morning.
