They Didn't Speak.

By RUTH CAMERON.

An acquaintance of mine has just lost an excellent position in an office. She had been working there for several years and had made a name for herself. Her peace with one of the other workers. They quarrelled a few weeks ago and after the quarrel they didn't speak. Their employer stood this uncomfortable state of affairs for a while, but finally the disagreeable atmosphere got on his nerves, and he told the two women they must be pleasant to each other or leave. My acquaintance left.

"I Never Get Over It."

She told me about it afterwards. "When I got good and mad at anyone," she said, "I don't ever get over it."

"Didn't you hate to leave?" said I.

"Oh, yes," she said, "it was a good place, but I said I'd never speak to Emma again and I wasn't going to for anybody."

She tossed her head. It was evident that she was very proud of her vindictive spirit. I don't believe the original offense that caused the quarrel still bothers her. I think she sticks it out because she visualizes herself as she appears to others.

She enjoys picturing herself as vindictive.

She fancies people saying "When she gets mad she stays mad."

And with a queer, perverted pride she enjoys the picture.

That is her ideal of herself. She would sacrifice much (I happen to know, that in leaving this position, she sacrificed more than she knew to live up to it.

What a good friend and what a bad enemy pride is!

It is a black stiffener. It helps you be faithful to your ideal of yourself. But you must be careful what that ideal is.

People often hold that ideal of vindictiveness. I have heard several people speak with pride of quarrelling with quondam friends and never having anything to do with them again. They seem to think there is something fine about that.

He Went Down Cellar And Shot His Dog.

Again, a man told me once that he went downstairs and shot an old pet dog of his who barked and disturbed him and his guests during a card game. He sat down to his cards without saying a word and his guests would scarcely believe him when he told them later what he had done. He was in the main a kind-hearted man, exquisitely tender to his invalid wife and very fond of animals. But he evidently held some distorted ideal of himself as a steely nerved, flint-hearted sort of man.

You can do few better things for your children than to teach them to be proud of the right things.

160 Centuries of History in a Rubbish Heap—New Light on the World's Past from the Island of Venizelos—Lady's Dress 9,000 Years Ago.

The little Mediterranean Island of Crete, boasting but three towns in place of the hundred cities which flourished when Homer knew it, is chiefly notable to us, in the hurly-burly of war, as the birthplace of Venizelos, the man who once saved Crete from the tyranny of King Constantine's brother, and is even now, as we go to press, once more in Crete to save Greece herself from the tyranny of King Constantine. Should that happily come to pass, it will not be the first time that Europe has had reason to be thankful to this little island of Greece.

We have had a reminder of this fact in Sir Arthur Evans's address to the British Association.

Sir Arthur Evans is an explorer, not of new and barbaric lands, but of lands in whose silent, passionless heart is buried the secrets of a magical past, and Crete, where his discoveries have made him world-famous, has yielded from its rubbish heaps one of the richest harvests of knowledge ever garnered.

Until but a little while ago we looked upon ancient Greece as the wonder-child of the world's culture, science, poetry, rhetoric, logic, the source of the painter's and sculptor's art, the surgeon's skill, and the chemist's learning. We regarded intellectual Greece as having evolved from intellectual chaos into the richest flower of mental and moral elevation that the world had known, a sort of national Jonah's gourd come to perfection in a night. But these things do not happen.

Sir Arthur Evans has dug from the mound of Knossos a story of unrivalled romance, a story of laws and learning and high spiritual life wrought by the people of Crete thousands of years before Greece rose to eminence. He shows that the wonderful power and exalted standing of ancient Egypt and Babylon were no more isolated than that of later Greece. It was part of a much larger whole than we had imagined. The records of one civilization after another are buried in that hill of wonders at Knossos, just as the wonders of Nineveh and Babylon are buried under the sands and debris of the Mesopotamian plains. We can trace back the history of this wonderful island and its people, its kings and priests, its artistic women and beautiful children, for nine or ten thousand years.

Four thousand years before the dawn of Christianity, Crete had a culture equal to that of Egypt and Babylon, and it lasted for 2000 years, eventually spreading over the Aegean and Mediterranean countries. It is difficult in a few words to do justice to this earliest of European civilizations; its achievements are too manifold. "The many-storied palaces of the Minoan priest-kings in their great days, by their ingenious planning, their successful combination of the useful with the beautiful and the stately, and last, but not least, by their scientific sanitary arrangements, far outdid the similar works of Egyptian or Babylonian builders," says Dr. Evans. "Think of that high state of scientific perfection of physical life

6,000 years ago, and then remember that in the time of Elizabeth those sea-dogs of ours who scoured the seas of all the world used to die from disease like flies in their little ships, and found consolation only in the fact that their lives were less unhealthy than those of men at home, in the foul and filthy little land called England.

They had their high art, these old-time Cretans, and their wonderful frescoes remain upon the walls of their buried places, paintings which tell us the daily lives of the people. "The modernness of much of the life here revealed to us is astonishing. The elaboration of the domestic arrangements, the staircases, storey above storey, the front places given to the ladies at shows, their fashionable, founced robes and jackets, the gloves sometimes seen on hands or hanging from their folding chairs, their very mannerisms as seen on the frescoes, pointing their conversation with animated gestures—how out of place it would all appear in a classical design!" But we find it all at least 9000 years ago. There is this difference between the art of old Crete and that of classical Greece and Rome that not one single instance of indelicacy has been found in all the remains at Knossos, though nowhere, not even at Pompeii, have more pictures from the past been called to light. Probably this purity of their art was due to the religious control exercised by their priest-kings.

DREAMS.

I hope some day to write a song that will astonish all the throng on this old planet grooping; but I have to buy the children lids and shoes and pie, I'll take it out in hoping. I often think if I had time to put my best into a rhyme, John Milton would look faded; but writing doggerel that pays takes up the passing hours and days, and keeps me worn and jaded. I don't suppose I'll ever pen the ode that will astonish men, and bring me Shakespeare's laurels; and as of old my ink shall flow, expounding lessons all men know, and bargain counter morals. But when all day I've lyred and lyred, until I'm frazzled out and tired, it's pleasant to sit dreaming of that far day when I shall write an ode so full of force and light, the critics will be screaming. And thus your dream is soothing you, though you may know it won't come true, this side the river Jordan; it's good to have some kind of goal; and so, for duds and grub and coal, you struggle on according.

"It is not proper to make a single announcement serve for an entire household. One invitation should be sent to Mr. and Mrs. Smith" another to the "Messrs. Smith" and another to the "Messrs. Smith" answered her aunt.
