PRESERVATION OF BOOKS FROM FIRE.

An Interesting Experiment in a London Gentleman's Library. From the London Academy

That books of exceptional value should be protected by enclosure in covers or covers of some kind is an admitted fact; ht has hat and bowed in the most graceful but it is not so easy to decide upon the afford the best chance of safety to what lies within. All books cannot be housed in iron safes; we must be content to see most of them ranged on shelves, with or without a glass front, and to know that "Well, and who are you bowing and they are still liable to damage from fire, scraping at ?" In less than a water, dust or foul air. From dust we can preserve them by close cases serving as an outer building, but the case must be pierced with air-holes, so that the tenant on breathe a pure atmosphere; the waat of air injures a book as much as a many affecting it with damp, midew and rottenness. As against the possibility of a fire, the orse should be made strong enough to re-sist the action of the flames; while the ar noites. on the other hand, must not be so large that the deluge of water which quenues the fire can enter through them and wok irreparable damage on the vol-ume within the case. With the view of obtaining a preck-s notion on this subject— "That's what I think—just exactly what I think, and you can bet your boots I don't scrub any more steps for people with an in-come of only $10,000 a year!" And she flung the brush into the pail of water, where the soap was already de-posited, tossed a big rag after it, and hus-tled for the back door trilling: "Peek-aboo-aboo-aboo-

A second, of which the case was of the usual kind, but also upperced with sir-holes, came out intact and unburt. The third, in a case resembl-ing that of the second, but pierced with air holes of good diameter, suffered most, the fire and the water by which the fire was extinguished having both found adthe fire and the water by which the fire was extinguished having both found ad-mission through those punctures, the water-being the more deleterious agent of the two. The book was, however, not materially injured. From this experiment it may be concluded that a good case will, in almost all instances, preserve a book from destruction by fire; that a metal licing to the case is not necessary, and that the sir holes (which experiments of a different kind have proved to be indispens-
