Olivia

OR
Was For Her Sake

"Miss Vanley, I find it difficult to speak to you tonight, almost impossible to say what I feel it is my duty to myself, and to you, should be said." His voice was very low and grave, and his eyes as they turned to her were full of sad earnestness. "I know what it costs you to talk to me, and I know how much you wish to rid yourself of me."

"Why should I?" she said, though she knew. "Because you feel that I have forfeited your esteem, that I have acted dishonorably. You will think still worse of me when I tell you that I cannot, that I dare not explain my conduct to you the other day—that I am compelled to suffer the continuance of your contempt and scorn because I am unable to tell you all, to lay my heart bare to you. But it breaks as well as I could the sorrow your refusal cost him?" "You—you did the best for him, your friend," she said, faintly. "Yes, I can believe that."

"Yes, I did the best," he said, gravely, "and he has gone, I think wisely. Before he went he exacted a promise from me. May I tell you what it was?" "Yes," she said, simply, her eyes fixed on the ground, her heart beating in sad harmony with every word of his grave, musical voice. "It was this: Bertie's—Lord Granville's love for you was of that order which loves still though it can never profit by its love. Though you are lost to him you are still the one being in the world for him, and it is not saying too much to say that he would lay down his life for you."

"Her eyes filled with tears. 'If he could have trusted me, let me know he would have stayed near you to be ready at any moment, at any cost, to do you service; but he was not strong enough, his love made him weak. Miss Vanley, Bertie asked me to promise that I would, as it were, take his place—that I should be ready, should the occasion offer, to lay my services at your feet. You smile.'"

"Smile!" "It sounds absurd that I should presume to tell you of such a promise, and now I ask you, for Bertie's sake to honor this farewell wish of his, and permit me to remain your friend."

She was silent. "Do not imagine that I shall think you hard or unforgiving if you refuse. I shall understand; I do understand. But if you can do so, let me consider that you permit me to keep my promise to Bertie. He would give his life for you, and I shall never be required to prove how glad I would do anything for you; but when you let me think that if at any time you needed me, improbable as it sounds, you would remember Bertie's compact with me?" "They had reached the terrace by this time, and the light fell full upon his face, eloquent with an expression almost noble. She turned her eyes to his and held out her hand."

"For Bertie's sake," she said in a low voice. "He held her hand in his firmly, not pressing it. 'It is a compact,' he said gravely. 'Fidelity to me, I will keep it. If ever the time should come—' He stopped abruptly, for the window was flung open and Bartley Bradstone came out hurriedly. 'It's thoughtful and—' and cruel of her," they heard him say angrily. "Out at this time of night and alone!" "My dear Bartley," said the squire's quiet voice, "Olivia has been so accustomed to wandering about the place since she was a child."

"Oh, ah, yes; that's all very well; but it's different now, things are altered. She ought to remember that she is going to be my wife, and—"

By this time Olivia and Faradeane had partly ascended the steps and he had seen them. He stopped suddenly and glared down at them with an expression of angry suspicion and jealousy, which rendered his rather good-looking face positively ugly, and a passionate oath leapt from his lips.

"This—is this pretty," he exclaimed looking between them, for even in his passion, he could not face Olivia's clear, cold eyes, or Faradeane's calm gaze.

"Where have you been, Olivia?" asked the squire, gently. "She went up and laid her hand on his arm. 'I ran down to the lodge to see Bessie, and Mr. Faradeane kindly offered to come back to the house with me, dear,' she said. 'Oh, Faradeane, is that you?' he said, coming forward. 'How do you do? Thanks for taking care of my little girl; she is rather a runaway-gate,' and he smiled as he held out his hand. Faradeane shook hands with him."

and then held out his hand to Bartley Bradstone, Bradstone looked for a moment as if he were going to refuse it, and his face got quite red, but he took the proffered hand at last. "Rather a— a strange coincidence isn't it?" he said, breathing hard. "Were you spending the evening at the lodge?" Harold Faradeane looked at him calmly, without the slightest sign of resentment of the insinuation. "No," he said, "I happened to be passing and heard Bessie propose to escort Miss Vanley up the avenue and I offered myself as a substitute."

"Oh," said Bartley Bradstone, with as much of a sneer as he dared display, "which she accepted readily enough, of course?" The crimson flooded Olivia's face and neck; but Faradeane met his covetly furious face with calm self-possession. "Which Miss Vanley was kind enough to accept, as you say," he said. "We met with no adventures on the road, and I return her to you safe and unharmed," and he smiled. "Thanks, thanks; come in, all of you," said the squire, hurriedly, with a spasm of pain at Bartley Bradstone's exhibition of temper. Faradeane looked at his watch. "Too late, thanks," he said, lightly. "Good night, good-night, Miss Vanley," and he raised his hat. Then he raised his hat. Then he turned to Bartley Bradstone. "Splendid night for an astronomer, Bradstone." The other man glanced up at the sky and then at Faradeane's calm face. "Eh," he said. "What do you mean, Faradeane, looked around to see if the squire and Olivia had got indoors and out of hearing, then said; 'One word with you, Bradstone.' 'Well, what is it?' sullenly. 'Walk with me to the lane,' said Faradeane, quietly. Bartley Bradstone hesitated for a second, and his face began to grow pale.

"I—I—it's late, and beastly chilly," he stammered. Faradeane moved on and the other man followed as if he had been dragged. When they had gone a couple of hundred yards Faradeane stopped. "You wish to quarrel with me, Bradstone," he said, regarding the other with calm intentness. Bartley Bradstone's face went ashen and he shrank back and put up his arm as if to ward off an expected blow. A bitter smile crossed Faradeane's lips. "Do not be a coward as well as a fool," he said, with quiet contempt. Bartley Bradstone flushed— anything above a cur would have spurred into at least the semblance of courage at the terrible scorn of tone. "You—you dare—" he began, blusteringly.

Faradeane's hand dropped upon his arm and grasped it in a grip of iron. "Speak more quickly, please," he said, "and don't threaten. Why, man"—and he smiled grimly—"if I were as helpless in your hands as you are in mine you would not dare to strike me." He dropped the arm, which felt as if it had been seized in a vise. "Listen to me. You wish to quarrel."

red. I do not, for a reason which you would not understand if I gave it to you. You have insulted me, which is—nothing. You have insulted the woman who has stooped to be your promised wife. "Stooped," blustered Bradstone, but very quietly. "Yes; but how low you alone know," said Faradeane, his eyes fixed on Bradstone's face, which went white. "Do not venture to do so again. Why, man"—and for the first time his voice showed signs of the emotion which racked him—"have you so little sense as not to appreciate the treasure you have secured? Are you such a hopeless fool, so utterly blinded by self-conceit, as to undervalue the prize you have snatched?" "I am not so blind as not to see your game," began Bartley Bradstone.

Munyon's Witness

GEO. BARBEAU TELLS HOW HE WAS CURED. "I had the first twinges of Rheumatism last fall. I first noticed it in my knee, and finally it went all through my body, and my knees were swollen up like bladders, and red, as if filled with blood. I secured two vials of Munyon's Rheumatism Cure, and the swelling soon went down in my feet, so much so that my wife could put on my shoes for me. I take a dose of pills once in a while simply as a preventive. The pains have all gone and have not returned since I first started taking them." Mr. George Barbeau, 13 Nicholas street, Ottawa.
