Ald. Wagstaff spoke against public ownership as exemplified in the management of the civic car lines.

W. H. Fenwick said the sewage plant should be moved at least seven miles away, and he thought the ward should have five aldermen, instead of three. Walter Brown was a labor nomlinee. He contented himself with condemning the sewage disposal plant, and stating his favor of a tax on unearned increment. William Douglas based his claim to election on his life-work as an education, believed in vocational training and co-operation between parents and school officials.

J. H. Jones wanted more male teachters. He said maimed soldiers, when pro-

OF OFFICER'S WIFE

Supported Invalid Husband by Acting as Chauffeur.

A fine story of a woman's devotion to a husband—an army captain invalided out of the forces with heart disease—was told recently at Bowstreet, London's famous police court. Mrs. Katherine Moule, a good-looking young woman, attired in a neat navy blue costume, with peaked motor cap, was summoned for plying for hire with an unlicensed carriage. It was stated that Mrs. Moule had come from the Portsmouth district to gain a livelihood for herself and her husband, and that their sole means of support was what she earned with her support was what she earned with her car. She had told a policeman that her earnings came to about £5 a night.

Mrs. Moule said she owned and drove the car, but received orders over the telephone and fild not ply for hire.

She had got together a good collection of customers since she came to London, and had been encouraged by policemen to ply for hire, and even hailed by them.

J. McMulkin asked that he be elected to the office of alderman, and if so he would do all in his power, to keep taxes down, declaring that the present taxes were keeping the people poor.

E. F. Singer, candidate for board of education, stated that his education qualified him to ask for the assistance of the electors. "Efficiency and economy," he said, would be his platform.

Mr. McClelland was given a rousing reception. The candidate said that his reason for running was because he was interested in children. At present he said he was superintendent of a large school of 1,000 pupils. If elected he would see that every contract was justly given out. He favored teaching domestic science to the girls. After the war was bryught to a successful end he would endeavor to have gymensiums with swimming pools for the boys and girls in the schools, as well as a lecture room. He would also favor the extension of playgrounds so that the social life of each of the districts would centre around the schools.
