REVOLT BREAKS OUT IN INDIAN STATE

Believed to Have Been Caused by Action of the Native Ruler.

The despatch from Allalabad does not explain the people's grievance. The assumption here, however, is that the trouble was not directed against the British government, but against the native ruler who, while answerable to the British government, has very full powers in the administration of domestic affairs of his state. Irrespective of Tonk, it is well known taxation and many of the native cities is exceedingly high and in some cases well night and in some cases well night and in some cases well in any unbearable, while the people have little or no say in their government.

The government.

The government formed in 1917 was a coalition. The present government was without the semblance of a coalition. It was a reactionary Tory administration,
The prime minister had sought to take credit for the war record of the Unionist administration. But he must realize that most of the members of that administration had resigned. The government of 1917 was purely a war government, Had it been anything else it could never have been formed. Important matters of domestic vital concern, other than those immediately onnected with the war, were expressly excluded from the consideration of any parliament that might be returned. The public was told that the prosecuion of the war was the sole issue and on that issue they returned the Union

In the speech from the throne reference was made to a revision of the tariff, presumably at the present ses-sion of parliament. The Union government expressly excluded the tariff as a question with which the government would be entitled to deal, without first giving to the people of Can-

Constitutional Practice.

The contention of the opposition leader, said Mr. Meighen, was that if a government came into power as a war government it should go out of power at the conclusion of the war. If that was correct, presumably a peace government should immediately resign when a war started. The leader of the opposition would hardly have advocated such a policy in 1914. The constitution practice in Canada, said Mr. Meighen, was for a government to hold office five years. The usual practice was to run

To the contention that the government had not pledged itself to resign after the war, Mr. King replied that this argument pre-supposed such an amount of cunning and colossal deception that it was unworthy of the government. The prime minister had said he heard no demand for a general election. Surely the recent by-elections must have convinced him that such a demand existed. The record of by-elections since 1919 was a record of defeats for the government in nearly every case.

The leader of the opposition then moved the following amendment to the address in reply to the speech from the throne: "We respectfully submit to your excellency that your excel-four years, but as long as the administration held the confidence of the people it had a right to run its full course. The only reason for holding an election before the full term had expired would arise as the result of some great constitutional issue dividing the house and, possibly causing a division in the government itself.

"As long as a government retains the confidence of the country," said the prime minister, amid applause, "It is recreant in its duty if it allows itself to be stampeded by party press or party politicians, into giving up office before its work is done."

Mr. Meighen said he had been trying to discover Mr. King's reason for placing the amendment before the house in its "naked form." Apparently Mr. King's object was not to place a great, clear issue before the people, but rather to go to them with no issue at all. Last year, in his speech on the budget, the leader of the opposition had complained that the government was making no tariff modifications. Today he was crying out that the government must not touch the tariff

In East Elgin, the Liberals had a candidate who stood on something akin to Mr. King's platform. He had succeeded in being burled at the foot of the poll. Finally, there was West Peterboro. In this constituency the leader of the opposition had endeavored to contest the election on the question as to whether the present government or the Liberal opposition should be in power. In West Peterboro. Mr. King had placed himself in a position from which he might have difficulty in extricating himself. He had supported a candidate who stood for free trade in foodstuffs, while in Yale he had supported one who had advocated protestion of foodstuffs.

The leader of the opposition had leclared thruout his whole western tour that his party and the Progressives were practically in accord on the great issues. In East Elgin, the Liberals had a can-

Duty to Carry On-

Mr. Meighen referred to the presence in the government of the Hon. J. A. Calder, president of the privy council, Mr. Calder, he said, was consistent in regard to the tariff. He was standing where he stood when the Liberal party was in power. He was standing just where the Hon. W. S. Fielding was standing now, and where he would stand if the Liberals got again into power. The difference got again into power. The difference between him and other Liberals was that he was not pretending to stand some-If parliament would dissolve now, be fore redistribution, a subservient Liberal press thruout the country would be shouting that dissolution was a sharp trick on the part of the prime minister, because it would be said that he had robbed the it would be said that he had rebbed the west of its proper representation. In those cries, he felt sure, Mr. King would join. If parliament were dissolved now, nothing would be obtained but a confused and uninterpretable voice on the tariff issue. Under circumstances now prevailing, it was a clear duty of the government at all events for the present to varing, it was a clear duty of the government, at all events for the present, to carry on, to carry out its policy. So long as the majority of the members of the house supported it, the government intended to carry out that duty.
