An English authority on golf gives the following vivid though rather appalling description of the golf course at Tientsin, north China:

"The course is 5,224 yards, mud and sand greens, as it is impossible to grow turf good enough for greens."

One of the most sporting courses in the far East. A large mud wall (30 feet high) with moat intersects the course, and is utilized for hazards and elevated tees. Groups of Chinese graves, consisting of mounds of earth, sometimes ten to twelve feet high, piled over the coffin, which is laid upon the ground, form excellent hazards. A unique local by-law permits the lifting of a ball from an open coffin without penalty.
