CHAT WITH A PAWN BROKER.

The Oddest Thing Ever Offered to Him—The Business Not All Profit.

"The oddest thing I ever had offered to me," said a pawnbroker, "was a skeleton; and I didn't take it. I hadn't any doubt that it was all right, that the man that offered it owned it, and had a right to sell it. I suppose he was a medical student who wanted money just then more than he wanted the skeleton. But I didn't know anything about the value of skeletons, and how much to advance on it, and so I didn't take it. But that will give you some sort of an idea of the variety of things that the pawnbroker has offered to him."

"Of course, you understand that not all pawnbrokers take everything; there are men who advance money on nothing but watches and jewelry and diamonds and pictures and that sort of thing and who wouldn't give anything on the handsomest satin-lined overcoat that ever was, because it isn't in their line. They have no place to put such things; no conveniences for taking care of them. And then there are pawnbrokers doing a general business who take all sorts of things, watches and banjos, boxing gloves and silver spoons, practically anything and everything that offers. They might occasionally run across something that they wouldn't take, as I did with the skeleton, but not often; there's practically nothing but what they will take, and practically nothing but what is offered at one time and another."

"On some things the amount advanced is very small; but still I've got things in safe that I never should get my money back on if I had to sell them. You'd suppose it would be easy for the pawnbroker to give on a thing no more than he could get for it if he had to sell it, and so it would be; but as a matter of fact he may give more than he could get back. He would be probably by circumstances, and by his judgment of the person offering the goods."

"I might have a customer bring in a diamond ring that I would lend so much on, whatever it was, and that would be a safe loan; the ring would be good for it if it was never reclaimed. But may be the next week the same customer, hard up and needing money, would bring in a pair of trousers, spotted and worn, not worth much if you had to sell them. And very likely I would lend more on those trousers than I could ever get for them; lending that because he's a customer and I want to accommodate him, and want to keep him as a customer, and because the chances are that he'll take the trousers out again; but if he doesn't why then I'm out."

"The question of whether a man who wants a loan is likely to redeem what he offers is often taken into account. It is a common thing for the pawnbroker to look at the man, maybe a stranger, and lend on his judgment of the value of the thing the man puts down on the counter. Of course, he makes mistakes in this, but he takes the chances, and I suppose he often gets it right then not. There might come in here you, or anybody, needing money, with an old-fashioned key-winding watch that I could not get $1 for, and want to borrow $15, and very likely I'd lend it though I know I never could get my money back if the watch wasn't redeemed. But I know, or I think I know, at a glance, whether he will redeem the watch or not, what sort of a man he is, and how much he values the watch for its associations; and I go according to my judgment."

"No doubt as a general proposition, the pawnbroker gets out to lend on things no more than he could sell them for; there are times when instead of making money he loses it; what he tries to do is to get a profit as the net result."

STRAPPED TO A CHAIR.

Frank Donnelly's Parents Leave Him All Day Confined in a Garret.

Bridgeport, Conn., July 28.—With his hands and feet strapped to a chair and his body in a position which forced his head over the back of the chair, Frank Donnelly, 12 years old, was found yesterday afternoon in the attic of his home, on Summer street. The room was tightly closed, and the sun beating down on the roof, made it seem like an oven. The boy was rescued, after seven hours of torture. He was nearly exhausted. His parents had left him there for punishment.

A neighbor who heard stifled cries coming from the garret of the Donnelly house, knowing that the boy's parents were out all day at work and that the house was locked, complained to the police. Policeman Hatch was obliged to force a window to enter.

The boy was hauled to the chair so tightly that the strap cut great wedges in the flesh on his legs. He was so weak that he responded in feeble tones to the cheering words of the policeman. Hatch removed the straps and cords and carried the boy out into the air. The boy's throat was so parched that it was some time before he could utter intelligible words. Then he told the policeman that his parents had left him in that position before they went to work in the morning to punish him.

When the police visited the Donnelly to ascertain why this method of punishment had been adopted, they explained that Frank was an incorrigible child and had given them much annoyance, getting into all sorts of mischief while they were at work. Mrs. Donnelly told him a few days ago that if he did not change his habits she would "teach him a lesson" that he would remember. The boy ran away that day and failed to come home at night. Yesterday morning he entered his home early and his mother seized him and took him to the garret, where his father bound him to the chair.

They closed the attic door so that his shouts would not be heard while they were about at work.

Superintendent Birmingham warned the parents that they would be arrested if they inflicted such punishment on the boy again. Frank was told that if he continued his misconduct he would be sent to the State Reform School for Boys.

SCYTHE IN THE PINE TREE.

A Curious Reminder of the Son's Going to the War, Never to Return.

Thirty-eight years ago young Augustus Bliss, of Warwick, quit cutting brush on his father's farm, hung his scythe on a pine tree and went off to war. The soldier boy never came back, and the scythe has never been taken down from the tree where he hung it, but has become imbedded in the growing pine until it is a fixture. This pathetic reminder of the great civil struggle is a familiar sight to members of the Shemott Club of this city, as the tree stands near the club's comfortable quarters in Blissville, a hamlet just across the North Orange line into Warwick.

When young Augustus Bliss left home and parents, to fight his country's battles, Blissville was a busy centre of small industries, traces of which remain to tell the story of the shifting of the scene of manufacturing from the small country hamlet to large centres. The tree has witnessed all these changes, has seen the mill standing near slowly falling into decay, the population changing, but still the scythe hangs there, summer and winter, a mute testimonial to the devotion to duty that animated young Bliss. His father, Milton Bliss, was engaged in building the dam standing by, and sent his son to cut some briars that were in the way of stone that were needed. After the briars were cut the scythe was hung on a small pine tree near, probably without a thought of how long it would remain there.

In a day or two Augustus Bliss went to the front, having enlisted for a three year term of service in the army some time previous. The young soldier never came back. He was but eighteen years old when he enlisted, August 4, 1862, in Company H, Thirty-sixth Massachusetts Regiment. While with his regiment in the South, he was overtaken by a fatal disease and died in an army hospital at Mildale, Miss.

The circumstances of his contracting disease were very sad. He had gone to get water for his comrades, and his company had orders to march while he was gone. He tried to overtake them, and the over-exertion was more than he could stand, and he was taken ill with fever before he had been in battle. He was not brought home for burial, but his name is on the roll of honor on the soldiers' monument at Orange.

In all these years no one has meddled with the scythe. It has hung there a symbol and visible reminder to his father of his son's devotion to duty. As the tree grew, the scythe has become imbedded in the wood, until it is a part of the tree. The snath, which has been forced off the scythe by the growing tree, is supported in its original position by a small framework. The woodwork of the tholes has yielded to the action of the elements and fallen away. Around the tree, which is probably a little over a foot in diameter at its base, has been erected a railing—Springfield Republican.

Her Head a Fright.
