CHAPTER XXIV.

THE LURE OF GOLD.

Sir Edwin would have preferred to get on to Ballarat; but Olive stood firm and insisted on their staying at the rough but cleanly inn at Wangoo. She meant her father to have a thorough rest before the interview with Reuben.

She would have liked to hear Reuben's tale herself; but he seemed to have disappeared, and though she learned all about the part that he played in the rescue, it was not until the evening that she saw Reuben enter the building. She at once informed her father, who, in his turn, entered the building. She at once informed her father, who, in his turn, entered the building.

At first Reuben was tempted to refuse the meeting. Indeed, he had termed himself a fool for not having left the district at once. But he went upon the room at last, bowing coldly and formally to Sir Edwin as he entered.

"Sit down, Mr. Wynter," said Sir Edwin, with quiet dignity. "I think a certain explanation is due on both sides. I don't know why you left Bingleigh in such a hurry. I only know that when I came down to your cottage the following day to thank you for saving my daughter's life, I found it closed up and in the greatest disorder—"

Reuben started, as if about to speak; but Sir Edwin held up his hand. "Let me finish now," he said. "I repeat, everything was in confusion and showed signs of your sudden flight. More than that, all the money just collected from the estate was missing from the library at the Hall; and what is even worse, Polly Styles had disappeared, and it is said you were the last person to be seen with her. Now do you wonder at my words?"

He stopped speaking, and Reuben looked at him fearfully. "No, sir," he said. "And had such charges been true, do you think I should have dared to look you in the face? There is a vile plot somewhere, and the rest of my life shall be spent in clearing my honor."

"Why then did you leave Bingleigh so suddenly?" asked Sir Edwin, but in a less masterly tone. He was only too willing to believe Reuben, even in spite of old Griley's proofs.

Reuben flushed; then looked up again. "I could do no less," he said. "When I was fortunate enough to save Miss Seymour from the mill stream I thought she was dead, and I lost control of myself. I betrayed myself—"

His voice faltered and broke, while Olive hid her face in her hands. She dared not glance at him, or she, too, would have broken down.

"I thought it best to leave Bingleigh," continued Reuben; "and I arranged everything. The money was put in the library drawer with the account books. My cottage was in absolute order, and I left a note together with the key. I met Polly Styles, certain, as I passed down the lane, and she was evidently waiting for some one. I can hardly expect you to believe me, but I assure you, Sir Edwin, I speak the truth, and I will give you my oath, if you desire it."

Juice of Lemons! How to Make Skin White and Beautiful

At the cost of a small jar of ordinary cold cream one can prepare a full quart of cream of the most wonderful lemon skin softener and complexion beautifier, by squeezing the juice of two fresh lemons into a bottle containing three ounces of orchard white. Care should be taken to strain the juice through a fine cloth so no lemon pulp gets in, then this lotion will keep fresh for months. Every woman knows that lemon juice is used to bleach and remove such blemishes as sallowness, freckles and tan and is the ideal skin softener, smoothener and beautifier.

Just try it! Get three ounces of orchard white at any pharmacy and two lemons from the grocer and make up a quart pint of this sweetly fragrant lemon lotion and massage it daily into the face, neck, arms and hands. It naturally should help to soften, freshen, bleach and bring out the roses and beauty of any skin. It is wonderful to smoothen rough, red hands.

CHAPTER XXV. CAUTIOUS CONFIDENCE. To say that the unexpected meeting with Reuben had touched a chord in Olive's heart is to say but little. All the old love rose more fiercely than ever, and the thought of wedding Morgan revolted her whole being. She was in a painful dilemma, indeed, for it was the Verners' gold that had enabled them to go to Australia and thus regain her father's health; it was to their generosity—so she thought—that she owed the restoration of Bingleigh; yet as the time approached when she would be called upon to pay the price, the idea grew more and more abhorrent to her.

The sight of Reuben with his clear, sun-tanned skin and honest eyes, so full of their mute adoration, had been an agony, even in its very sweetness. The other man had given his gold—or, rather, that of his father—but his man had risked his life twice for her, and while in her service had endured blows and insults, to say nothing of the false accusations made against him.

Sir Edwin and Olive had told no one of their meeting with Reuben, hoping that facts would come to light to prove his innocence by the time he returned to England, but as the days passed and nothing was heard of him, Olive's face grew paler and paler. Deep down in the recesses of her heart there had lurked a faint hope that Reuben would return and free her from the clutches of the Verners, but now she felt that this was impossible. They had been back in England for some little time, and she had had no news of him, and there was no one who could give her any, for she knew that, during her absence in Australia, old Wynter himself had come over to Topsy, asking whether Reuben had ever come back again. Topsy, of course, had been unable to tell him anything, and Olive longed to see the old man again, if only to relieve his suspense, for she thought that he, too, might have mourned for Reuben as dead.

Still thinking of the young man and his newly found fortune, she wandered from the grounds back into the Hall, where she found Mr. Normanby in the drawing-room, awaiting her return.

Success had changed that gentleman more than a little. His manner was as easy and polished as ever, his dress as faultless, and his composure as immovable. But his tones had assumed a more insolent ring, as those of one who revelled in his conscious power; while the genius which had enabled him to gain his seat manifested itself to all those with whom he came in contact.

He had spoken in Parliament with remarkable effect; he had indeed already made his name distinguished, and if it had not been for his habit of leaving blackmail on weaker minds such as Morgan Verner, he would have been worthy of his trust as one of the governing powers of the country. But adventurer he was, as well as a money leader of the most unscrupulous type, and men hated him, even though they feared him too much to betray him. It was said that he would be a great man in the time to come; but, in reality, he was now at the height of his power; and he was known not only in the haunts of pleasure, but also in the councils of wisdom.

Lately he had been too much occupied with his own immediate affairs to pay much attention to the webs which he had woven around the fates and fortunes of Reave Hollow and Bingleigh Hall. But he had heard of Sir Edwin Seymour's return, and, being short of capital, he betwought himself of his bond with the Verners. Accordingly he made his way to Bingleigh, determined to bring matters to a head and see Morgan married to Olive Seymour before the next parliamentary session.

Little did Olive suspect his plans concerning her future, as he came forward and bent over her hand with such elaborate deference. Totally ignorant of the influence he had wielded over her life, she yet felt a faint sense of distrust in him. But she welcomed him with becoming warmth and kindness.

"Have you come to stay?" she asked smilingly. "Yes, if you'll have me," he rejoined, with an inquiring glance at her pale face. "Sir Edwin was kind enough to ask me to spend my first holiday here, and I have ventured to take him at his word. But if you would rather not have me—"

"Oh, no, no!" cried Olive, distressed that he should think her inhospitable. "Indeed, the longer you stay the better pleased I shall be. Mr. Normanby, I am sure my father will be delighted. He is always glad to welcome old friends."

She rang the bell as she spoke, and ordered the butler to have a room prepared for the unexpected guest. She had had no idea of his coming; but as Sir Edwin's memory was not overgood, she concluded that he had written the invitation and had then forgotten all about it afterward, which was just what Mr. Normanby had depended upon when he invited himself to Bingleigh. She followed her guest into the conservatory, gay with many-colored flowers.

"My father is resting in his room," she said, in gentle apology. "I like him to keep as quiet as possible. But I have sent word that you have arrived."

"I am sorry. I had hoped that I might be looked upon as one of yourselves and be allowed to wander in and out without giving any trouble," said Mr. Normanby. "I do hope Sir Edwin will not disturb himself for me."

AUSTRIANS MAKE DESPERATE ATTACKS.

ROME, Jan. 17. The Austrians yesterday made desperate and prolonged attempts to recapture positions taken Monday by the Italians east of Capo Sile on the Lower Piave front. GARFIELD'S ORDER POSTPONED.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 17. Fuel Administrator Garfield's drastic order restricting the use of fuel which is effective at midnight tonight was promulgated shortly before 6 o'clock. Within a few minutes after the Senate adopted a resolution asking that the order be postponed for five days. Officially the Senate vote was 50 to 19. Virtually no substantial changes were made in the order though some war industries specially designated will be exempted from the provision of closing manufacturing plants for five days, beginning to-morrow, and for Monday holidays during the next ten weeks. The resolution adopted by the Senate is as follows: "Resolved that the Fuel Administrator of the United States be, and he is hereby requested to delay for five days the order suspending the operation of industrial plants in portions of the United States in order that protests may be heard and investigation made and information presented."

NEW YORK, Jan. 17.

In a statement to-day detailing the plight of the railroads and the expected relief which the federal fuel order should bring in clearing the freight congestion, A. H. Smith, Assistant Director General of the Interstate Commerce Commission, said that the fueling of 100 or more ships held in New York Harbor for lack of bunker coal, would have a far-reaching effect on the general situation. When fueled, he said, they will take cargo which in turn releases freight occupying space required to take in other freight, which should back in cars on the piers in the yards and on the side tracks which have been congested operations. It is the story of "The House that Jack built" reversed. This is the fuel that clears the ship can take freight that clears the yard and from yards that blocked the road.
