[For the Post and Thus WITHERS.] WAITING FOR THE TRAIN.

In the heart of the mountain regions of Vermont, and surrounded by the hills nestles an exquisite gem. I cannot call it a villagesay a living picture. Hill, stream, valley and glen, all were there, placed in such perfect, delightful order, as only the Great Architect's hand could accomplish. The little rural station, with its platform for passengers, seemed like a toyhouse built after the Swiss cottage style, embowered in ivy and Madeira

" Marrietts," shouted the conductor, as the engine gradually slackened its headlong speed, and one solitary passenger out of the many on board-your humble servant, dear reader-stepped on the platform. I had telegraphed to the relative I was going to visit to | neck. meet me at this hour for the journey lay over the mountains, some five or six miles, but it seemed I was to be disappointed, for their was no conveyance in sight. I sat down on the nearest seat to enjoy the exquisite pano- after me at the blacksmith's forge on the rama that lay before me, stretching and craning my neck every now and then, in the init seemed likely I would journey. My restlessness, I suppose, made the station master take pity on me, for he brought out an easy rocking chair-that indispensible article in an American house—saying, "this is a little essier than that stiff bench, ma'am. May as waiting for some conveyance to come for Aon Ja I thanked him, remarking at the same time on the beautiful scenery. "Yes, ma'am; fine scenery; finest in Vermont."

" Well,ma'am, you are not the only one who sees that resemblance."

"No doubt you have a great many artists sketching through the summer days?"
"Well, yes, a good deal of the long-haired turn-down collar, half-cracked looking chaps, that go in ecstasies over the place. But not one out of every ten can do it half justice. Fact is, ma'am, it takes a person that Providence has sent into the world with that gift in their brain and practice in the ing a horse was not included in my last art at their finger ends, to make this place live on canvasor board. Too many daubers and conceited botches at the work now-adays. There was one chap from Canada, some time ago, I forget his name ; 'twas an Irish name, anyway. He could bandle the pencil or brush best of all the painter tribe that has been round here. I'll bet the Scotch glen, as he called it, lives wherever his fingers are."

"You seem pretty much isolated," I remarked; "no neighbor's house in sight; and it below the medium height, dressed in a kirtle would be an exquisite spot for a summer re-

They do not embarrass by watching her, as they do it in such an easy natural manner; always something to send or receive by the train, a telegraph, or letter to post; for you know, the depot is the rendezvous for country folk. First when I seen her I used to feel queer, but now I've got used to the same thing every day."

"Without being inquisitive or intrusive, might I ask you to tell me some more about this poor mother."

"Well, seein'as you may have to wait some time here, and the story, though sad, may interest you, here it is: No doubt you remember the loss of life some few years gone in Scotland, on the giving way of the bridge over the Frith of Tay. Well, this son was among those who went down, and he promised his mother to meet her at the village station when his train came in. He had sent her as a Christmas present, a tartan dress and scarf, requesting ber to wear it when she came to meet him. Poor fellow, he never came, and when the terrible news flashed over the wires to anxious expecting friends, it came with such lightning terror to this poor mother that reason fied. Another son, the eldest of the family, had married here in Vermont, and settled on a large farm belonging to his wife. On hearing of the Tay disaster he went over to Scotland, and brought back his lonely crazed mother, who believes she is in her native glen, and that every morning at ten o'clock, she must be on the platform to meet her Alec. She tells them her boy told her he would be with her before her tartan dress or scarf had grown faded. And as they always replace them before they show signs of wear. she clings to that hope each day that her darling will come to-morrow. Her daughterin-law says if any one could speak to her in the same Scotch accent that her children addressed her in, and that Aleo invariably used. it might break the cloud that is on her brain.

But no one seems to know how to roll their tongue round the rr's." " Has her son, that she lives with, forgotten his early accent?" "I believe be has, at least I never heard him speak in any other manner than a re-gular Vermonter. You see he came out from Scotland a very young lad; has always lived here, and married a Vermont girl, and a rich one too; owns three or four of the finest farms in the State, and just as nice a woman as you could known; no sire or kinks, or nonsense about her; she's my ides of a genuine lady. But her mother-in-law, she is the prettiest piece of God's handiwork I ever seen. That Canada chap I was telling you of, he did his best to draw her into a chat, so that he might sketch her face; 'twas no use, she don't seem to hear anyone, or notice anyone, speaks to nobody; just goes up to the engine driver's cabin, looks him full in the face, then shakes her head so sorrowfully and whispers to herself, 'not my Alec; no my laddie yet.' Then back over the same little footpath she has made for herself, with constant coming and going, to her son's house.'

"If I had come in the morning train I might have seen ber?"

knowing her story, you would not have been able to recognize her. Now, if you ever come this way at that hour you will be on the look out for the tartan dress and gcarf."

"Do you know, I almost wish something would occur to prevent my friends from sending for me this evening, though where I would quarter myself for the night seems rather uncertain, as there is no sign of a hotel and strolled of in the direction of her home. about. The truth is, apart from the desire I have to see her, perhaps I might be able to son, a tall, fine looking young man, who had awaken her interest in those around her." "Well, I think I am Squire Harland's cousin, and I did expect some one to take me over the mountain, but it seems I am's well take it easy as not. I reckon you are fixture for the present; how long will it be before the waggon is repaired?"

"To-morrow at noon, ma'am. Say tore, where will the lady stay to-night?" This he addresses to the station master.

"All right, youngster; the lady will ge all the attention the squire's madem would "Finest anywhere," I answered; "seems herself," and with a laughing good-bye to us, like a glimpse of fairyland. I have seen and a "get up Old Buckram" to his heree, my something very like it in sketches taken from mountain courier was cantering back the way the Scottish Highlands."

My host and myself indulged in a hearty laugh as the remembrance of my strange wish, expressed only a few moments since, came to our minds. "Well, ma'um, seems to me you must have found the wishing cap we hear of in the children's fairy stories, for just as you wished It so it turned out." "I will have to be very careful what I wish for in future, as breaking excitrees and lamwish.

My kind host and his amiable wife made me very comfortable for the time being, and would not permit any remuneration for their trouble, save my grateful thanks. The following morning when the ten o'clock train whistled its advance, they showed me the best place to stand so that I could have a good look at the old lady from the time she of manhood, but invites the roses of health to came in sight. A slight graceful figure, rather of tartan that will always be dear to the Scottish heart, and carelessly over her head was thrown a scarf of the same colors but of a silken and finer texture. Nothing in her manner of walking or general appearance betrayed that resson was dethroned, unless the total unconsciousness of strangers. Were she the sole inhabitant of this mountain glen she could not have maintained a more unconscious demeanor.

The above lines came to me as I looked in crowning piece, so perfect was her beauty in old age. Just as her skirts brusned passed me I ventured:

"Yon's a bonnie silken plaidy, ye we'r. ne'bor, an' a bonnie kirtle tae, it gaes me unco pleasure, tae see the tartan mi mither used tae we'r when I was a bit lassie."

"Aye, aye, ne'bor; a bonnie tartan enow. My Alec sent it tae his auld mither for Cirmes wear." This she said with a startled look like ons auddenly awakened.

"But, ne'hor whar did ye come frae? Cam' ye frae the north kintry, or up frae the Moffat Hills?"

"I was'na frae the. Moffats," I replied, "but my mither's folk were Inverness, among the Hielans."

Just then the engine rolled up to the platform, and instantly she was close up to it, peering into the small boxed-up cabin, where stood the dusty, cinder-sprinkled driver.

"Good morning, Mrs. Caverhill," he cried out with a good humored smile, for the poor

A book that is likely to possess features of great interest will soon be published in Berlin. Privy Councilior Siteber was for many years connected with the police force of the German capital, and in the policical branch of that service displayed much activity, and passed through many varied experiences. In 1848 he was an energetic leader in the party of the people, but found reason to change his allegiance. He possessed rare ingenuity and skill as a detective, and at one time was a source of continual unessluess and danger to political refugees in London, among whom he was in the habit of going in various disguises that defied exposure. In Berlin, too, he learned much that belongs to the sacred history of that capital. His mem irs, that are now about to be given to the public, will probably contain many an interesting revelation.
