

The advantage, in favor of the chartered bank, apart from the important consideration of its control of much larger means—none of its capital being locked up in debentures—was approximately the difference between the banking profit on the amount of its capital and the interest on an equal amount invested in Government securities. In other words the chartered bank would get the greater return from both circulation and capital; the free bank from circulation alone, its capital being invested, by law, at a lower rate of interest.

This higher gain to be had from employing their funds in their own business, also caused the chartered banks, as a rule, to reject the encouragement offered by the Legislature so to invest those funds in debentures as to make them practically a permanent loan to the Government. And in a country where the best bank profits were moderate, other investors were slow and unwilling to engage in a form of banking in which the chances for gain were still more restricted.

IV.

In November, 1854, there came before the Legislature the question of the renewal of bank charters, and the increase of their capital stock. In this connection Sir Francis Hincks admitted that the public had not shown any great disposition to take advantage of the free banking law. He said further:

“First. He thought that the public wanted a large increase of banking capital.

“Second. There was not money in Canada to furnish that capital.

“Third. The country must get this capital from foreigners, and the people of Canada would have to consult foreigners as to the manner in which it should be done.

“Fourth. The country knew that no English capitalist was disposed to furnish money to Canada through the agency of private banks. But English capitalists would recognize the large chartered banks, because these banks had been known for many years as a safe means of investing capital. * * Capitalists had confidence in them, but they would not have confidence in private banks established under a new banking system. If the people wanted to increase their banking capital they must do so through the existing banks.”
