The Girl at Home

The Girl at Home

Some generations ago it was the established custom that the boys in a family went forth to forage and the girls stayed home to cook and sew and perform the ordinary round of household tasks. If for any reason she did not marry, then custom fixed her standing in the community. She must stay in her father's house, dependent on his bounty, a lingerer in the nest she had outgrown. Hardly a happy situation, was it, to feel that one was overstaying the natural time in the home. Now, it is very different. Parents want to keep then to their children in the home just as long as they cane. The girls may go out to earn a living if they so desire, but the home is theirs so long as they care to stay in it. In some respects, tho, the father of today expects the same attitude on the part of his girls as did that old-time father. He expects to maintain the same parental discipline he exercised over the girls during childhood. The old-time girl had to stand it. She was dependent and yielded a dependent's obedience, and the world expected it of her. But now! Many girls use their father's house as a very grater part of the biouse, and in don-trast with it the satin used for the collar and shaped trimming bands seems to have high lustre.

The tucked net chemisette and the pleated lace frill are also white, and it wory buttons are used on the satin band. A tiny low and buttons of lack velvet ornament the chemisette.

Nature does not give us any example of a permanent relation between parent and offspring. It is the law of the nest that the birds must fly as soon as they can, forage for themselves and mate in due season, build their own nests, raise their own families and send them on their way in the unending perpetuation of their kind. So with the beasts and other nature tribes. The relation is not intended to be permanent—only temporary. If this is the case then parents and children should have for each other great' consideration. And if the children stay on in the home to oblige the parents, the parents should appreciate the fact by allowing them to be reasonably free to follow their chosen pursuits.

Miss Katharine Griggs, Roxton rd., has left for a three months' visit to Pasadena, Cal.

On the other hand, if the home is sheltering the children past the time of the ratural dependence, then they should not expect of their parents a continuance of the "giving up" which characterizes a parent's attitude towards a child. Rather should the home be given over to the gratification of the elders, since the children have ruled it so long. It all simmers down to a question of "give and take and put yourself in another's place."

Chemistry of Cleaning

HE question of cleaning stands next to that of food and clothing in the mind of the average housekeeper.

Soap is said to be the result of a high degree of refinement; populations using the greatest quantity have been found, by test, it is said, to be most civilized.

As cleanliness results in beauty, health and comfort, these claims are granted; but the one may have the best of cleansing agents and the finest soaps and good intentions galore, it does not follow that best results are always obtained.

Ways obtained.

Every soap maker claims his product is perfect, so if housewives do not know why "oil" soap is excellent for some uses and resin, or alkali, soap preferable for others, much of their work is only misdirected energy. Mild soaps are best for light cleaning. Soft soaps are caustic and more effective in removing dirt and grime.

An excellent article, economical and lasting, is made by dissolving several bars of ordinary kitchen soap in hot water. Add one-third as much salsod as you have dissolved soap. Stir well and allow the mass to cool into a soft white curd.

If soap is wanted for washing fine linens and white fabrics, cut two bars of white soap fine and dissolve in warm water. Add four tablespoons of borax to this mixture. The borax is milder than washing soda and its uses for delicate cleaning are innumerable.

If a stronger agent is wanted than either of the above, add a teaspoon of ammonia to each quart of soft soap. Ammonia is a good servant but a bad master. It may be used on everything but brass. It softens hard water, cuts grease and grime. It may be had in liquid or in solid form.

In the lump its cost is usually in the neighborhood of thirty cents a pound, but this has twice the strength of the liquid.

A small lump of dry ammonia or a tablespoon of the liquid will precipitate the lime in a tub of water, just as washing soda does, without injuring the flesh or the clothing.

tate the lime in a tub of water, just as washing soda does, without injuring the flesh or the clothing.

Soda-ash is the cheapest form of alkali, and women would do well to remember this when buying cleansing powders in boxes. The "ine," or "crystal" or "io" that they pay ten to twenty-five cents a box for, probably is only potash or some cheap alkali that sells for five cents a pound.

Our grandmothers used wood ashes to furnish this necessary alkali. The results of their cleaning days were beautiful, but roughened hands told of the biting quality of their soft-soap.

Lye is a dangerous article and should always be dissolved and kept-in a stoppered jug and used sparingly.

The mild soaps sold as "oil" soaps are for use in cleaning finely varnished surfaces, oilcloths, linoleums and painted surfaces. The white soap mixture given above may have a spoonful of kerosene added to it and will answer excellently well.

In these days of good laundries wise women send the laborious part of the washing away, but there are always numberless small things that one the washing away, but there are always numberless small things that one

A carelessly laundered article is worthless to a refined, particular woman, so use first-class laundry aids that will remove stains and germs without the necessity of rubbing. Rubbing delicate fabrics over a rough wash board will wear them out more than a week's hard wear.

American women are bringing brains to bear on their work, and a speedy solution of many a "servant problem" rewards them, for the laws of chemical change are inexorable.

There are three acids that should be on every laundry shelf; they are oxalic acid for iron rust, mildew and fruit stains; acetic acid for stains on lace and fine articles; muriatic acid for removing ink stains and restoring
