SONG-THE WINDS.

The South wind sings of happy Springs, And Summers hastening on their way; The South wind smells of cowellip bells, And blossom spangled meads of May: But sweeter is her red, red mouth Than all the kisses of the South.

The West wind breathes of russet heaths. And yellow pride of woods grown old: The West wind flies from Autumn skies, And sun-clouds overlaid with gold: But the golden locks I love the best Outshine the glories of the West.

The North wind sweeps from crystal deeps. And Arctic halls of endless night; The North wind blows o'er drifted snows, And mountains robed in virgin white: But purer far her maiden's so

The East wind shrills o'er desert hills And dreary coasts of barren sand: And ships that sink in sight of land: But the cold, cold East may rave and moan, For her soft warm heart is all my own.

The light of mine, 'Once at home with the younsters' merry prattle sounding in my ears, I forgot my uneasy feeling, about the morrow's job; but the moment I dozed off to sleep, it came back to me in most hideous dreams. I thought I was falling down, down, down! and just as the crash of my body striking the earth seemed inevitable, I woke up with a start to find myself bathed in a cold perspiration, and trembling in every limb.

No more settled sleep visited my pillow that night, and it was a relief when the booming of several clocks warned me that It was now time to face the reality.

The morning was bitterly cold and boisterous; scarcely a soul to be seen, and the dull thud of my footseps sounded mournfully in the stillness around. At last the great chimney loomed in sight; and gazing up at its height I shivered at the thought of Bessie and the children spurred me on. So I began to ascend the staging.

The higher I went the morrow's job; but the moment I dozed of to sleep, it came back to me in most hideous dreams. I thought I was falling down, down, down, down! and just as the crash of my body striking the earth seemed inevitable, I woke up with a start to find myself bathed in a cold perspiration, and trembling in every limb.

The higher I went the more intense The higher I went the more intenses the cold seemed to be, and my fingers became quite numbed by the hoar frost that was clinging to the spokes of the ladder. In a ahort time I reached the platform at the summit, and looking downward my blood lurned cold as I realized the immense depth to the yard below. Giving myself a shake to rid myself of the dizzy sensation, and unhooking from the pully a tub of mortar my mate had sent up, I began my solitary work.

I had been hard at work for more than an hour, and was getting a little more reconciled to my position, when a flerce blast came shricking around the chimney. I was nearly overthrown, and in the endeavor to recover myself I tilted the tub of mortar from off the edge of In a second, to my intense horror, I felt the boards and all that were on them felt the boards and all that were on them gliding away with me from the chimney, and in a few moments I should have been lying a mangled corpse if I had not succeeded in throwing my arm over into the hollow of the shafe, where, when the scaffold and its load of bricks rushed downward, I was left hanging, with certain death awaiting me the moment I loosened my hold.

My first impulse was to throw my could live it I was taken from them. The thought brought me back to more selfish ones, and I kept asking myself, "must I die!" How long could I hold on with this fierce wind besetting me? Is there no hope? Will no one, seeing how I am placed, strive to help me?

kite fluttered nearer and nearer. How it tried to steady myself with one hand that I might grasp the cord with the other as soon as it came within reach, comevividly before me now. But it never did come within my reach; a gust of wind either carried it farther away, or dashed either carried it farther away, or dashed it to the ground.

An hour passed, and though still clinging to the brickword—it was almost unconsciously, for cold had worked upon me so that I became quite dazed, the people, the confused noise in the street, and my own perilous position, seemed to be jumbled together in a tangle which I could not put straight. While in this half-sensible state, I heard a voice shout my name. But it had to be repeated twice before I could rouse myself sufficiently to hear what was said.

"Bill! Bill Lindsay! cheer up mate, help is coming!" were the words which rumbled up the shaft.

After this there was a pause for some

After this there was a pause for some minutes, and scarce able to control my excitement, I tried to think how this help would come. Then there was a warning shouted to me to keed my head back, followed by a whizzing, hissing noise; and looking within the shaft, I saw a bright shower of golden sparks lighting up the well-like hore, and knew that a rocket had been fired.

But it struck the brickwork in its ascent, and failed to reach me, so that once more I was left to wait and hope unonce more I was left to wait and nope until the voice again shouted for me to keep clear. A moment a flery tail of sparks shot upward far above me, and an earnest "Thank God!" came from my heart as I grasped a thin cord that fell by my side as it descended.

By this communication a stouter and stronger rope was sent to me. But my danger was not over, for in my weakened and numbed state it was perilous to slice down it. At first I could hardly brace my nerves up sufficiently to launch myself over the brickwork, and my head turned dizzy. For a moment I thought myself over the brickwork, and my head turned dizzy. For a moment I thought myself gone, but conquering the feeling by a great effort, I slowly descended until half the distance was accomplished.

Then the horrid fear seized upon me, "What if the rope should break, or not be securely fastened?" and dreading every moment that my fears should be fulfilled, in feverish haste I slid on.

When within a few yards of the bottom overtaxed nature could bear the strain no longer, and loosening my hold, I dropped into the arms of those who had been breathlessly watching my descent.
