Hearts and Hazards

"How in the world did you learn at?" he exclaimed.
"He told me so himself," said that?"

Gertrude.
"Oh!" Sage nodded solemnly. "Of course. I might have known you learned that way."

course. I might have known you learned that way."

She drew back and surveyed him with suddeh suspicion.

"Dad, are you laughing at me? Yes, I see you are. Well, just wait a minute!"—she slipped from his chair and hurried to a desk, where she wrote down each of the familiar names mentioned by Henkel. Returning, she extended the paper to her father. "Jdst to prove that you are doing Mr. Henkel a grave injustice, I want you to write to every one of these people and ask them if Mr. Henkel isn't a friend of theirs. Will you do that much?"

"Gladly," he smiled, pocketing the paper.

"Gladly," he smiled, pocketing the paper.

"And then, if you find that he does know these people, will you invest in his proposition?"

He shook his head at her.

"But, Dad! You mean you won't invest at all?"

"I mean I won't invest simply because no happens to know some of the best people in Chicago."

"But why not?" she cried, surprised. The following morning he received a report from a mercantile agency concerning Presley Henkel, and this and two confidential letters which came in the morning mail, persuaded him to believe that in dealing with Mr. Henkel one would do well to beware of spiders.

believe that in dealing with Mr. Henkel one would do well to beware of spiders.

Thus, when Henkel appeared before him, Sage was on his guard. He entered the office, smiling and bland, hard upon twelve o'clock, with an invitation to lunch.

"I shan't be lunching for an hour yet," said Sage; and the touch of reserve in his voice indicated that when that hour came he would lunch alone.

"I'm sorry," said Henkel. "I like to talk business while eating, and I had hoped that we might reach, an agreement about our—about the investment you are considering."

"Yea. Too bad. But I've just about reached a decision, Mr. Henkel."

"Ah! A favorable one, I hope?"

"Well, no; not exactly. In fact," said Sage, glancing at the commercial report lying upon his desk, I've about decided not to go into it."

Henkel's quick, alert eye darted at the report; and quite suddenly a remarkable expression crossed his countenance—his mask was lowered, revealing an evit soul—but only momentarily. In another second he had recaptured his poise and was again affable and smooth.

"Mr. Sage, don't, I beg of you, be influenced by any adverse statement of his poise and was again affable and smooth.

"Mr. Sage, don't, I beg of you, be influenced by any adverse statement of my pecuniary standing. Perhaps I have not made my position sufficiently clear: I have no money—that is no money of my own. I've given you my word that I will put up an amount equivalent to yours, in case we enter this venture. This money will be supplied by my Uncle Rudolph, who has pledged himself to back me with almost any sum, provided only that I find a partner who will furnish a like amount. Perhaps you are acquainted with my uncle, Mr. Sage—Rudolph Heakel of Chicago."

"I've heard of him. He's in the clothing business, isn't he?"

"Clothing and dry goods. Made a very tidy sum at it, too; more than five millions. If you prefer, I shall be happy to bring you a letter from him, substantiating all I've said."

"That, no doubt, would be advisable; but after all the whole thing hinges.

"That, no doubt, would be advisable; but after all, the whole thing hinges on whether or not you can actually make gasoline at one cent a gallon. I've seen no proof of it yet, you know."

I've seen no proof of it yet, you know."

"I know. However I shall telegraph today to my assistant in Chicago for a sample of the compound, and will have it analyzed by a competent chemist and its cost of production determined. I want to have everything square and aboveboard, Mr. Sage."

Around three o'clock on this Monday afternoon Sage wrote two letters to Chicago, and, though each asked the same specific question, both were directed to different persons—face to Rudolph Henkel, the other to a genealo-
