Foremost may be mentioned the introduction to the British Parliament of l'olonial representatives. The muchinery of the Colonial office is netorious ly incapable of meeting the requirements of the case. Lord Grey's admin stration has been more productive of complaints than any of his predecessors; but the fault is rather in the system than the man. Those who filled the post before him emirace some of the best practical statesmen of the day; but they all retred from the Colonial office with reputations more or less daminged.
