A Blind Weaver.

A blind boy stood beside the loom
And wove a fabric. To and fro
He made the fabric firm and strong.
He made the busy shuttle go.
And oft the teachers passed that way
And gave the colors, thrust by thread;
But by the boy the pattern lay
Was all unseen. Its hues were dead.
"How can you weave?" we, pitying cried:
The blind boy smiled. "I do my best:
I make the fabric firm and strong,
And out that sees does all the rest."
Oh, happy thought! Beside life's loom
We humbly strive our best to do,
And He who marked the pattern out,
And holds the threads, will make it true.

The McBains.

"He'd be glad too, for the timber alone, and when the railroad goes through, the land will be worth—"

"An' there's the greatest place on it for a house." The words fairly burst from Lion's lips. "A hill sloping to the south with a pine grove on the north of it, and a spring creek winding round it. You'll come and see us after we build there, won't you, Uncle?"

"The afternoon wore on, and presently the team was brought round; for Jim must needs be in Red Creek that night, in order to catch the early stage. He took leave of the family in a gale of lament, and into each small hand that he shook was pressed a silver coin. Mum, who was holding the horses, was careful to be overlooked in the leaving-taking, but in response to a waving hand, she the sleigh swung out of the yard, he nodded his head.

Busy days followed Uncle Jim's visit. It was the time for close reeling against midwinter's approach. The boys went whitening about their work, warm at heart, and glad just to be alive—and together. The cellar was full of potatoes and red-checked apples. The bay colt grew bigger and more of a handful to lead to water every day. Christmas was drawing near, when the pigs would cease cawing, and become roost and spare ribs to store and beyond all else loomed forth blent months where they would daily, and shoulder to shoulder, cover the miles that lay between them and the school-house. And at night there would be no tasks awaiting them, except perhaps a few light ones, and the pleasant work of getting up to-morrow's lessons.

"I wish father was doing teaming and we were going to school now," said Lion, with deep longing in his tone. In reply Mum threw his arms around him. Lion promptly braced himself and crooked his knee, and then they went in a rapturous tussle. At last the day came when McBain cashed in. The following day the stage bore away a letter and an order for two hundred dollars addressed to Owen.

It was useless to look for a reply inside of a week; but there was no haste when there was no anxiety regarding the outcome.

In the meantime McBain enjoyed in anticipation the fret Murphry would find himself into when he discovered that Owen's place had changed hands. He had heard Murphry say no later than the previous day that he would like to turn a gang of men into Owen's tall timber. "Well, he would pay what it was worth now, to get it."

It was good, McBain thought, to feel that it was now in his power to refuse to be ground between the appertunities of necessity and the netlike millstone of Murphry's avarice.

Owen's answer came sooner than he expected. A neighbor on his way from Red Creek one day brought him letters addressed to McBain.

He recognized Owen's letter, and tore off the cover. There were two enclosures, one of which was the money order he had sent him. Puzzled, he unfolded the second enclosure and read:

DEAR MURPHY,—
"I've done beside myself trying to say whether you an' me been booked or whether some feller's gone to make you a present of a hundred akers. A feller came here two weeks ago an' he was your brother, an' lost you, no, but just sort o' persistent, he looked like yer, an' looked like yer, an' I give him the glad hand, he sed he'd been to see yer, an' we had a long talk about things in general, an' the kids in particular. I'm he came to blesses, he wanted to buy the place, an' you dident care to, cause you was sick of bush whackin, but you dident want to see Murphry get it, an' so hein that he was a brother of yours he thought I mite let him have it at some price. Well it looked reasonable, an' the kind of folk to the case, an' the amount of it was no truck's bargain. Now along comes your money an' you so chirpy as a crow about byin. I do'nt no what to think, but I'm sendin' back the money, an' I do'nt own the place any more, but if you've been cherted onto it you'll have to help redress your wrongs when I turn up from camp, an' you'll have to be ready to go to-morrow, but you'll see when I return, so no more at present from yours truly,

T. OWEN.

McBain looked up in a dazed way. The ruddy color faded from his face, his eyes fell on the letter which he held unopened. It bore the post mark of the old home town; fearfully he opened it, and as he read, his lips were confirmed.

"So may as well begin this letter privately 'writing you, because—"
