

Side Talks by Ruth Cameron

EVEN A TIGER.

Isn't it marvelous how a skillful author can enlist your sympathies for any person whom he chooses to make his hero or heroine?

Even if that person isn't a person at all but an animal.

The other evening I read a story about a tigress. She was represented as being different from the average tiger, gentle and almost kindly. When the circus tent blew down in a hurricane she escapes and goes into the mountains where her cub is born. Two days later while hunting for food for herself and the wee one she is shot and badly wounded and creeps back to lie down by the cub, weak and fevered.

How Our Sympathies Are Aroused.

So strongly does the author work up our sympathy for the mother feeding and petting her tiger baby even while she herself is starving and perhaps dying, that I did what I seldom do, skipped ahead because I was so anxious to know if everything came out all right.

In the end the tigress carries the cub back to her old home in the circus and I breathed a sigh of relief when I saw them safely received and domiciled.

Now isn't it perfectly marvelous that that sigh of relief could be won from me by my feeling for a fictitious animal, and further than that, an animal which ordinarily is identified in our minds with the idea of cruelty and savagery and treachery. "Tiger, tiger burning bright through the darkness of the night, what immortal hand or eye planned thy fearful symmetry?"

Horses and Dogs Are Closer.

It isn't so strange that the suffering of dogs and horses can touch our hearts because both of these animals suggest to us the highest and finest qualities, as much as if not more than human beings. "The more I see of men the more I admire my dog," For myself the three things in fiction which opened the fountain of tears most deeply were the death of Colonel Newcome in Thackeray's "The Newcomes," the disgrace of the dog Red Wull in "Bob Son of Battle" and the death of Ginger in "Black Beauty."

The author and I were discussing the tiger story and he admitted to a similar feeling of suspense, even though he is not so fond of animals as I. "It shows what a writer with skill can do," he said. "I wonder if he could take an insect as his hero and get us all excited over him."

Not the Fly or Mosquito.

We considered that point and decided that while there are certain insects, such as the spider or the ant or the bee, for which sympathy might be aroused, there are certain others, such as the caterpillar or the fly or the mosquito, for which not even the cleverest author could arouse sympathy.

Of course the way the thing is done is by personification, by ascribing to the animal the big human feelings. In the case of the tiger, it is the devoted mother love that arouses our sympathies. We are imagining ourselves in the animal's place and pitying ourselves.

And it would really be too much of a strain to imagine oneself in the place of such a detestable creature as the caterpillar, wouldn't it?

Embargo on Cheap Meat

OVERSEAS EX-PREMIER ASKS FOR ITS REMOVAL.

Extracts from the "Daily Express" were quoted again before the Royal Commission which was holding an inquiry into the House of Lords into the question of the removal of the embargo against the importation of Canadian cattle into this country.

"I was not responsible for the statement of the E. chers' Federation in the 'Daily Express' that the introduction of Canadian store cattle would reduce the price of meat by 6d. a pound," said Mr. William Henderson, farmer and stock breeder, of Coupar Angus, Forfarshire, "but I agreed with the estimate at the time and in the circumstances then prevailing."

A ludicrous picture of the Highland glens of Scotland if Canadian cattle were imported was drawn by Mr. James C. Booth, farmer and butcher, of Peterhead. "Large areas of the glens," he said, "will be depopulated of the finest fighting men we have in the country."

Conflicting Views.

"What Canada wants," continued Mr. Booth, "is not the reduction of the price of meat, but to improve the price of Canadian cattle. It will be a bad day when we flood this country with store cattle from outside sources, no matter what the sources may be."

Mr. John Evans, of Lincoln, who gave evidence on behalf of the council of the Royal Agricultural Society, the Dairy Farmers' Association, and other bodies, was no more optimistic. He stated it to be his opinion that probably in June 1922 there would be as many cattle in this country as it could support.

Lord Morris, former Prime Minister of Newfoundland, gave strong reasons in support of the contention that the embargo should be removed. "I do so from the point of view of Empire development and Empire advantage," said Lord Morris. "I am not personally interested," he continued, "but Newfoundland imports seven-eighths of her cattle from Canada for the purpose of milch cows and for stall breeding. 'Generally speaking, from any point of view, there will really be no danger to this country from the importation of Canadian cattle,' he concluded.

THE HARDER PART.

It's mighty hard for Mother—I am busy through the day.

And the tasks of every morning keep the gloomy thought away.

And I'm not forever meeting with a slipper or a gown.

To remind me of our sorrow when I'm toiling in the town.

But with Mother it is different—there's no minute she is free.

From the sight of things which tell her of the joy which used to be.

She is brave and she is faithful, and we say we're reconciled.

But your heart is always heavy once you've lost a little child.

And a man can face his sorrow in a manly sort of way.

For his grief must quickly leave him when he's busy through the day.

But the mother's lot is harder—she must learn to sing and smile.

Though she's living in the presence of her sorrow all the while.

Through the room where love once waited she must tip-toe day by day.

She must see through every window where the baby used to play.

And there's not a thing she touches nor a task she finds to do.

But it sets her heart to aching, and begins the hurt anew.

Oh, a man can turn from sorrow, for his mind is occupied.

But the mother's lot is harder—grief is always at her side.

Taught a King Economy.

When King James was not yet James I. of England, but still only James VI. of Scotland, a letter was written which was extant in 1817 and was printed in Blackwood's (Edinburgh) Magazine in December of that year. It was a remarkable letter in its way, because it testified to the poverty which might even then "hedge" a king. James wrote his cousin:

"I pray you, lend me thy pair of silken hose in order to grace my royal person at the reception of the Spanish Ambassador."

But if James was once poor, and perhaps all his life a little fearful of swords, he became very rich and prodigal in his expenditures, and brave in facing the complaints of the keeper of the royal purse. The lord treasurer of England was often in despair when favorites presented him with orders for large sums. He determined to teach the king a lesson if he could do so in a diplomatic way.

The Earl of Somerset's appearance before the lord treasurer with a royal order for $100,000, was the opportunity which the treasurer seized upon. To make the king aware of how great were the sums he was squandering on Somerset, the lord treasurer invited James to an entertainment. In a room through which the king must pass the treasurer laid out four tables. On each table he piled $25,000.

The king was astonished by the four immense heaps of money. He had never before seen such sums with his own eyes. He stopped at he had ordered paid to Somerset. "Sound, man!" James cried. "One nice garnish to a fruit salad. Reason for this amazing display. He of these heaps of glittering coins is Blueberry muffs and white cream make a delicious dessert."
