THE TRIUMPH OF TRUE LOVE

She was leaving the room gently and moiselessly when Lord Selwyn spoke.
"Mrs. Rivers," he said, "pray remain; and will you—will you kneel down and read the prayers for my wife? They are gone to fetch Dr. Hearne, but he will not be in time."

She returned to her place. It was afternoon now, and the world lay in a glory of sunshine; the song of the birds reached them, the perfume of the flowers came in great gusts, but in that chamber was the solemn hush of death, broken only by the prayers of mercy for the one who could no longer ask mercy for herself.

Slowly and gently she read them. Who shall say if the grand, tender words reached that dulled brain? Who shall say what passed in the soul that hovered on the brink of eternity? Then Dr. Danvers came up to the bed and looked at the white face. He laid his hand gently on Mrs. Rivers.

"You pray no longer for the living,"
he said; "she is dead."
She was dead. When her soul passed to its judgment none of the kneeling there ever knew. There was little change in the face, save that the gray shades deepened. Lord Selwyn's was pitiful to witness. could almost believe," he said,

A gentle voice whispered in his ear: "Heave" 's decrees are not always or-"Heave 's decrees are not always or-dained in punishment; they are always wise, and always merciful!"

CHAPTER XXIII.

It was not until the first bewilder-ment of his sorrow passed away that Lord Vivian Selwyn thought of asking it happened. No one could tell The lady's maid told him all that Lady Beatrice had said, and he could not understand why his wife had been so determined upon visiting Redruthwhat could have induced her to brave his annoyance and his anger, to disobey his commands, to disregard his wishes. There must be some reason why, but he never discovered it. He went to the stables to ask what had passed. One of the men working there told him that Lady Beatrice had insisted upon having the chestnuts, and had forced the unfortunate groom to her. No one knew why-no one could give him the least clue as to wife had been so anxious to go to Redruth as to endanger her life in order to get there—neither servants, de-pendents, nor friends. He inquired anxiously at Redruth if Lady Selwyn had any appointment there with tradespeople, but he could not hear of any. He was forced to believe that impatience of the pain she was bear-ing, had sent her, at the risk of her life, to Redruth, in search of some-thing to lessen it. To the end of his life Lord Selwyn believed that, and it was well for him he did so. The secret of that journey, for which she had been willing to risk her life, perished with

All that she knew was, her husband had said, some days since, he was afraid the ponies would do mischief; they were so wild and full of spirit.

Lord Vivian did all he could for the woman. He gave her the cottage, and settled upon her a pension that would forever keep grim want from her door.

There was an inquest, but no one had anything to say, and the verdict was, of course, "accidental death."

It was wonderful what a sensation the accident created. Lady had not been loved; she was too cold, oo proud, too haughty to win much aftion; but she had been greatly adnired. She had been the queen of the ounty; she had held her place with ofinite and graceful tact, never failing i her social duties, dispensing her usband's hospitalities with a queenly and. She would be very much missed very one knew that. Then the world not only mourned her, but pitied her; it was sad to be cut off so suddenly, in the very prime of her magnificent womanhood and the very zenith of her To leave a little child-a boy so beautiful, so full of promise. was, how much to be deployed. Surely no accident created more sympathy.

Letters of condolence literally poured in upon Lord Vivian. The world never showed deeper pity or deeper sympathy. When the inquest was over, all that remained of the once beautiful, imperial Beatrice was laid ready for the grave. It was Mrs. Rivers who brushed the rich masses of hair from the marble brow, who folded the white hands on the culat breast who laid graves. When the inquest was over, all that requiet breast, who laid sweet roses and laid her warra lips on the cold lips of the silent dead.

Death gave strange majesty to th beautiful face. Looking at her lying there, so caim and so still, white lilies there, so calm and so star, white missing in her clasped hands, white roses lying on the cold, slient breast, no one could realize the evil she had planned. Lord Vivlan mourned for her—not with the passionate grief he had felt for the loss of Violante, but with a deep and earnest sorrow. What-ever her faults had been, she had been most terribly true in her great love for

One beautiful morning, when golden smile of summer gladdened the land, they laid her to rest in the vault of the Selwyns. Her errors, her crime, her long rivalry, her bitter jealousy, her ceaseless persecution of a motherless boy, were buried with her them more.

Men of high repute were there; no one failed; and the funeral of Lady Selwyn of Selwyn Castle was remember. Selwyn of Selwyn Castle was remembered long afterward as one of the grandest ceremonials ever witnessed.

Then came a lull: a time when Lord Selwyn seemed to sink into the very deuths of despair. It had been so sudden. He had seen his wife one morning, looking much as usual; in four days afterward she was dead and buried. The only thing that saved him buried. The only thing that saved him was anxiety for Rupert. The intelligence of Lady Beatrice's death could not long be kept from him. He saw the sad faces, the mourning dresses; he heard the tolling of the distant church bell, and the noise of the long funeral procession. They were obliged to tell him; and although she had been un-kind to him—how unkind none but him-travel On Mrs. Rivers the sad, sudden death produced a strange effect. It gave her time for thought, She had dreaded the revelation of her secret, that must have ensued when it became known; and now it was once more her own. She deplored Beatrice's sad death more, perhaps, than anyone, for she alone knew the secret of the terrible crime the dead woman had planned. She mourned not only for the lost life, but for the sin-laden soul so swiftly, so suddenly summoned before its Judge. suddenly summoned before its Judge.

She was miserably undecided what to do. There were times when it seemed to her the only atonement she could make for her error was to confess her fault to her husband, to tell him every motive which had actuated her, and let him punish her as he would. That idea would take possession of her until she was nearly throwing herself at his feet and telling him all.

Then came the reaction. The same motives that had led her to make the sacrifice existed still. They were rather deepened by the thought of how her son would listen to such a story and how it would affect him, She resolved at last upon keeping silent a short time longer.

The day came when Rupert was able to leave the room in which he had fought so fierce a battle with the grim King Death, and go downstairs. Soon as he was able to travel, his father asked him if he would go to Scotland, and

The great Emperor understood that primarily the soldier is a stomach. Primarily every man is stomach. The whole body and brain are andent for health and life upon the or riiness and completeness of the processes which go on in the stomach and allied organs of digestion and nutrition. People who have been treated for disease of head, heart, lungs, liver, nerves or blood have often been treated in vain, until they began the use of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. When this medicine had healed the stomach and cleansed the blood, the other diseases disappeared.

[Special Cable Letter to The Adver-

London, May 12.-Lord Salisbury's address to the members of the Primrose League on Wednesday and the remarkable utterances of the premier on that occasion continue to form almost the sole topic of conversation. Editorial writers quickly gave up the attempt to analyze for the benefit of the public the numerous features of the speech and were well-nigh staggered into silence by its baffling unexpectedness and the multiplicity of the issues it contained. It was delivered when the nation expected exactly the opposite kind of remarks. To implore his countrymen to awake in the perils constantly menacing the great empire, and its existence at the very momen when a long period of patient waiting had been replaced by jubilation over Lord Roberts' successful advance, an expedient which seemed so utterly bereft of the first principles of poli tics and policy, considering the a proach of the elections, that some Lord Salisbury's own supporters were

The whole tone of the speech lacked all those formalities, reticences and veil-ed allusions to which the English peo-ple have been accustomed since the days of Pitt and Palmerston. Lord Salisbury hitherto has religiously fol-lowed such precedents, but on Wednesday he spoke to the public as he would to an intimate friend after din-amazing and so interesting has been Lord Salisbury himself, as revealed this week, that the broad—and from the standpoint of other nations, the far most important-sensational feature of the speech has passed al-most unnoticed. Were the premier of any other European state to get up in these times of wars and rumors of wars, and urge the people of an eminently commercial race to accustom themselves to the use of firearms, and to establish rifle clubs in every city, village and hamlet, there would run through Europe such a shiver of fright and such vivid anticipation of hostile intention and devastating conflict that market prices would drop by tens, and mobilization plans would be at the finger-tip of every war minister.

That this has not occurred appears to be done to the generally recognized fact.

A curious incident connected with the parade of the Ladysmith naval brigade of the British cruiser Powerful was that the decorating authorities almost smothered the office of Lord Strathcona and Mount Royal, the Canadian commissioner, with the Stars and Stripes, while on the other side of the United States embassy, in the same street, there was no sign of an American flag. ## SENTENCED

Magistrate Administers Lenient Sentence—Will Deal Severely With Future Stone-Throwers-Robert Blackwell Fined - As-

John Sullivan, who was last week convicted of stone-throwing at a street car on the night of May 1, was this morning sentenced to three months in the central prison. In passing sentence Police Magistrate Love said that the offense was a most grave and serious one, for which the maximum penalty was life imprisonment. The man who took a missile in his hand and hurled it at a street car was endangering property and life, and giving the city the name of being a lawless community. His worship believed it right for laboring men to have unions and to organize for their own safety and advantage, but if such destruction of property were going to accompany labor processions, then it remained for the respectable and law-abiding men of the labor ranks to see that these processions did not take place on streets where the temptation to damage property would be found. In view of the circumstances that the prisoner had a wife and five children depending on him; and that he had previously been a good and industrious citizen, that a petition signed by prominent citizens had been presented in Sullivan's behalf, a lenient sentence would be imposed. Warning, however, was given that the next person who offend-ed in like manner would be punished in an extremely severe manner, regardless of circumstances.
