"Expecting company?" he asked maliciously.

She understood him and flushed resentfully. "If you wish to go around looking like a scarecrow, that's no reason why I should," she said. "The corn is too large for the crows to pull now, so if I were you I would touch myself up a little. I don't wonder that Miss Jocelyn mistook you for Jotham."

"It's well," retorted Roger, with some grown brothers here or you would come down to breakfast in kid gloves. I suppose, however, that they have insisted on a tidy and respectful waitress. Will you please inform me, mother, what my regulation costume must be when my services are required? Jotham and I should have a suit of livery, with two more brass buttons on my coat to show that I belong to the family."

"I think that a little more of the manner and appearance of a gentleman would show your relationship better than any amount of brass," remarked his mother quietly. Roger was almost through his breakfast, and so, at no great loss, could assume the injured part. Therefore with a dignity that was somewhat in marked contrast with his rather unkempt appearance, he rose and followed his son. This apparently vague utterance had been meagre and uninviting; therefore susan not brighten her costume by an occasional riters and youthful bloom and an opening flower that she would fasten in her hair the first of livery, with two more brass buttons on my coat to show that I belong to the family."

"Oh, Roger is young and foolish. He's agrowing yet," and the mother's severe aspect relaxed. He was her only boy.

Mr. Atwood, brought face to face with the alternative presented by his practical wife, succumbed with tolerable grace. In truth, having had his grumble out he was not so very averse to the arrangement. He was much like old Gruff, their watch-dog, that was a redoubtable growler, but had never been known to bite any one. He therefore installed himself as his wife's out of-door ally and assistant commissary, proposing also to take the boarders out to drive if they would pay enough to make it worth the while. As for Roger, he resolved to remain a farmer and revolve in his old orbit.

Mrs. Jocelyn and Mildred were listless and dittion of waiting and uncertainty which renders cheerful or systematic occupation. It was scarcely and suiting and uncertainty which renders cheerful or systematic occupation.

"Umph," remarked Mr. Atwood gententic. Jly, as he rose and followed his gon. This apparently vague utterance has for his wife a definite and extended meaning. She leoked annoyed and flurried, and was in no mood for the labors of preparing a second breakfast.

"The men-folks had better not roil me to much," she said to her daughter. "If your father had said No! out and out, I wouldn't have brought strangers into his home. But he kinder wanted me to have their money without the bother of having them around. Now one thing is settled—he must either help me make it pleasant for these people, or clest tell them to leave this very day."
