

an atlas of this sort, and we had the impression for a long time that the rest of the world was a narrow fringe around the United States. Says the Halifax Evening Mail: "United States books on history, geography, statistics or any general topic resemble the maps formerly used in Siam, in which Siam occupied nearly the whole sheet, the rest of the world being represented as a thin border." We see this overweening conceit exemplified especially in American Cyclopedias, or American editions of English Cyclopedias. We would not complain of it so much if these lopsided productions were exposed for sale only in the Republic itself, but to canvass for them all over the Dominion is an imposition of the worst kind. Anyone who does not want to traverse American wildernesses, climb American mountains, swim American rivers and thread American forests before he can put his hand on the smallest item of desired information will not be persuaded into purchasing an American Cyclopaedia.

FRANCIS PARKMAN.

BY SARAH K. BOLTON.

In Jamaica Plain, a suburb of Boston, stands a home which is a delight to those who are so fortunate as to enter. It is a two story and a half frame house, in grey, surrounded by great trees and gardens full of flowers. Azaleas are here in all their brilliancy; roses of every color, great red poppies, dainty clematis, varied columbines, rhododendrons, many kinds of iris, pansies and foxglove.

The bay windows of the roomy and cheerful home look out upon a sheet of water, half hidden by the trees. No sound of the busy city intrudes itself. The rowboats lie idly at the bank. The birds sing and the fragrance of flowers fills the air.

More interesting than the beautiful landscape, or the attractive home, with its books and pictures, is the owner of the home, a white-haired and sunny-faced man, most gentle and cordial in manner and refined in character. It is Francis Parkman, whom Blackwood's Magazine well calls "the most eminent American historian now alive."

His life has been indeed a struggle. Where other men would have failed he has succeeded. With a sublime patience, with indefatigable industry, with a laudable ambition and determination, he has overcome obstacles and won fame and honour.

Descended from a scholarly ancestry—his father, Francis Parkman, and his
