

LANGLEY'S VEGETABLE BITTERS.

FOR purifying the Blood, removing disorders of the Skin, STOMACH, and BOWELS, Biliousness, Liver Complaint, Debility, Headache, Nervousness, Lowness of Spirits, Palpitation of the Heart, Loss of Appetite, DYSPEPSIA, Burning Sensations in the Pit of the Stomach, Oppression after Eating, &c.

The Stomach is the grand storehouse of supplies for the whole human system. From it the food, carefully digested, goes to form Blood, and this, by means of the minutely ramifying blood-vessels, is carried to the bones, the muscles, the nerves, and the flesh, supplying each with material peculiarly fitted to build up the waste continually caused by action—physical or mental.

What the fountain is to the stream proceeding from it, that is the stomach to the body. If the fountain be muddy the whole stream will be polluted; if the stomach be out of order, the blood will be vitiated, and the whole system will partake of the evil results. How needful, then, to preserve this organ, thus intimately connected with every other, in good working order.

But in a state of Society like the present, this is almost impossible. "Fretting and Stuffing," as Abernethy has said, have been the chief hindrances to this desirable state of things. Hence the frequency of the complaint, "My stomach is not just right." Mourners go about the streets, standing at the corners thereof, and their cry is, "My stomach! Oh! My stomach!"

Where there is distress of this kind it is natural to seek for a cure, and the demand thus created has produced a supply of Medical agents intended to alleviate these distressing symptoms, and to effect permanent cures. Among these agents the Bitters above named have taken their place. These have been in use for several years, recommending themselves by being in reality what they purport to be—a medicine removing all morbid secretions, purifying the blood, and giving tone to the digestive organs, while it is at the same time grateful to the most delicate stomach, and remarkable for its strengthening & invigorating properties.
