Christmas Groceries. MEERSCHAUM. ARCTIC OVER-SHOES. Ayer's Cathartic Pills, American Cider, Agents
For the sale of the DAILY TRIBUNE. Steamers BY HENRY KINGSLEY. She answered that she had none at all, and continued, like a true daughter of France with money in her purse, that, if he could not keep her, they, grandfather and granddaughter, would be most ceitainly able to keep him. It was not an English way of putting the case, but it was most certainly practical.

So golden days came for poor Meerschaum. M. Escriot sent him to a college at Southsea to learn navigation. That science, in its rudiments, is not difficult. We have learned it three or four times ourselves, and can say with a safe conscience that we know nothing about it now. Meerschaum, however, assimilated navigation, and Lieutenant Maury, of the United States navy, having appeared on the scene shortly before, Meerschaum followed his theories, hanging on his words. H. Currie, corner Carmarthen and St. Andrews. R. Patchell, corner Carmarthen and Bri-Foster's Shoe Store, his words.

His examinations were passed splendidly. There was a slight difficulty about his obligations to the Royal Navy, but they were easily got over. He went into the Reserve. Ninette and he were to be married when his parents came home. They were expected every day.

The weather got dim and wild early that year. It stood at north, then at lorthest, backing steadily against the sun. Meerschaum, full of Reid, Maury, and Fitzroy, told them that a great storm was coming. Ninette and he walked across the sands to Broadstairs; the boatmen were ready for any thing there.

The great southwesterly storm of those days came on them more suddenly than they had thought for; it came on a rapidly rising barometer. From the ghastly position of 27.10 the barometer went up to 28.0. At three o'clock the disaster was upon them. There came a flying almost green-colored, cloud from the direction of Calais, and after that no one knew much more until all was over. The wind drove the sea in masses of foam toward the land. As darkness came on it was evident that all the lights in the Channel were useless on such a night as this. A wan came staggering through the surf, holding tight to a woman. Then a woman came, holding a baby; and then others recling in the wash, which was how beginning to slop up with the cbb.

All Kingsgate were out at once, and up to their waists in water. Michael Durnford pulled a man on shore and asked him what it was which had been wrocked.

"The Aurora," the man said. "Captalin Durnford. She is on her side on the reef there. He is going to stop till the last, and his wife with him."

M. Escriot and Ninette knew nothing of what was happening. In the awful roar of the storm, they once or twice held the door partly open, and peered out into the wild night. He faced it bare headed, but she wrapped up her head, because Michael always kissed her hair before they separated. She raised her hands and said, "Let us thank God that our boy is not at sea."

And M. Escriot said, "I will copy Lear. I'll pray and then I'll sleep."

When Michael heard the name of the ship, he knew what had happened. He was perfectly quiet. He said to two young men who stood by him.

"My father is captain of that ship, and my mother is with him. I must get off to them."

The two young fishermen to whom Michael spoke showed him that if the ship were where she was reported to be, he could get to her along that reef which lies to the west of Kingsgate. So he went out along it into the spin-drift, and was seen no more until the next morning.

* Blinded and bruised among the rocks, he made out the ship at last. She was lying at the edge of the reef, breaking her back. As he approached her he heard her cracking and ripping herself to pieces. She was on her side, and a ruin of masts and rigging was between himself and her. He saw his father and his mother advancing together along the malmmast to get as far on the spar as they could before launching themselves, and he called to them:
