Which Was The Heir?

CHAPTER XXXVI.
WHEN he spoke she started slightly, for her thoughts had been travelling back to those sweet days of the past—how sweet she had not known when she was living with him, but only realized now that they were gone forever.
'Oh, yes, I have been here some time,' she replied.
'Some time' might mean months or years. Geoffrey construed it as the latter.
'And do you know Brighton well?' she asked.
Geoffrey shook his head.
'Not very well. I have only been here once or twice before; and, until lately, not for some years. I have been out of England for some time.'
'Ah! that accounts for my not having seen you,' said Cottie, with wicked artfulness. 'You are an old friend of Mrs. Setton's, are you not?'
'Not an old friend,' replied Geoffrey. 'My acquaintance with her is only a very recent one. She has been very kind to me in a matter—in a certain business—an affair—' he blundered on. 'She is one of the kindest-hearted women I ever met.'
'Oh, yes, she is,' said Cottie. 'Of course, I am very fond of her.'
'Do you know Australia—have you ever been there?' asked Geoffrey, looking hard at the beautiful face, and utterly disregarding the footman who stood beside him offering an entree with the patience of a martyr.
'Oh, I've read about it,' replied Cottie. 'Everyone has.'
Geoffrey covertly wiped his forehead with his silk handkerchief.
What a fool he was to ask the question! What had made him do so? The footman caught his attention at last, and Geoffrey took some of the entree and ate it, not knowing what he was eating.
Cottie watched him, still in the covert, womanly way, and read the perplexity of his mind as if he were an open book. Her heart was aching over him. She saw how thin the strong hands had become, how distinctly the blue veins were marked in them. All her heart went out to him. She was almost mastered by the craving desire to lean towards him, to grasp his arm and murmur, 'Geoffrey, don't you know me? I am Ronnie!' But there was no sign of all this in her face, much less in her manner, as she pecked at the things in her plate after the way of women.
'Are you going back to Australia?' she asked, fearing that, unless she spoke, he must hear the beating of her heart.
'I don't know,' replied Geoffrey, laying down his knife and fork, as if he had finished his dinner. 'It depends.'
'You have some business—property—there?' she asked, with just sufficient, lady-like interest.
Geoffrey nodded and wiped his brow. Every word she uttered, every note of the clear, sweet voice reminded him of Ronnie.
'Yes, I've some property there,' he

'At least I've a share in it. Half of it belongs—to another.'
'Another man?' she asked, blandly.
'No, he's a boy,' said poor Geoff, almost to himself. 'I mean—it's some gold claims. We're partners. He discovered them.'
'I hope they are good ones,' said Cottie, with still the proper amount of interest.
'Oh, yes,' he said; 'they only want working to make both of us rich.'
'Then I suppose your partner—it's a boy, you say? how strange!—is out there, looking after the property?' Geoffrey took a good draught of champagne, and the footman promptly refilled the glass.
'No, he's not,' he said, almost curtly. 'He's in England. Isn't it very hot for the time of year?'
He leant back in his chair and passed his serviette over his lips, and she saw that his hand was trembling. She had mercy upon him and turned to her neighbour on the other side and so gave Geoffrey time to recover his self-possession.
The dinner proceeded. Course followed course in due order. Every now and then Cottie felt, rather than saw, Mrs. Setton's glance wander towards them with an anxious, questioning expression; but Cottie would not meet her eyes. She felt that she dared not do so. She was thrilling with Geoffrey's proximity, quivering under the consciousness that he almost recognised her, that some chance word, some unintentional reference to the past, would reveal the truth to him and bring about a catastrophe. She scarcely spoke to him during the remainder of the dinner; and it was with a breath of relief that, in response to Mrs. Setton's nod, she arose with the rest of the ladies to go into the drawing-room.
Geoffrey happened to be the nearest the door, and opened it for the ladies. As she passed, he looked at her fixedly, with a pathos in his gaze slept; the resemblance had only intensified and emphasised it. He wanted to see this Miss Setton again, and he longed for the moment when the men should join the ladies in the drawing-room. But the claret was good, and the old Major, who was dispensing it for Mrs. Setton, clung to the dinner-table as long as possible. They went in at last and at the very moment when Cottie was singing.

Geoffrey leant against the door, his eyes fixed upon her profile, his ears tingling with the resemblance of her voice to that of his boy. 'Great Heaven! It might have been Ronnie himself singing there! So painful where the thoughts caused by the strange resemblance that he would like to have gone then and there; but a kind of spell, fascination, retained him. He felt towards the girl at the piano as he knew he should have felt if she had been Ronnie's sister. He was jealous of, and resented, the attention of the men who thronged round her when the song was finished, and had an insane desire to push his way through their midst and take her off upon his arm; but he did not move, and still leant against the door, with the half-ferocious, half-grim expression which had set upon his face during dinner.
Mrs. Setton came up to him, woman of the world as she was, in a nervousness almost bordering on hysteria.
'Some of them are going to have a rubber, Mr. Bell. Do you care for whist?'
'I don't play it,' replied Geoffrey, scarcely moving his eyes from Cottie's tall, graceful figure as it moved across the room.
