

Stella Mordant; The Cruise of the "Kingfisher."

CHAPTER I.

"No, No! Let it be buried with me. Rath. Enough that I have warned you. Our race has more than the usual reason for shunning woman. There is a curse upon us, and she carries it in her form, her face, upon her lips. Shun her, Rath, as you would shun the snake—aye, more earnestly; for the snake kills the body, but the woman kills the soul, Rath!"

CHAPTER II.

To the dweller in cities the solitude which now fell to the lad's lot must seem too terrible for words. His only companion, his father, lay asleep in the grave in the shadow of the tall firs which grew thickly over nearly all the island. He had no one to speak to but the dog; he could neither read nor write; could hold no communion but that of his own thoughts.

But Rath, though he had loved his father and missed him sorely, was not oppressed by the solitude which would have driven most men mad. Until his last few days his father had shared the work of the island, and now that he was dead, Rath's toil was therefore doubled. There was the corn patch to hoe, the cabbages to plant, snares to set for the rabbits, and always the fishing. The streams and small bays were full of trout, and at this season of the year Rath caught and smoked them for winter consumption. The days sped by swiftly enough; but at night, though he made himself busy arranging the tackle and making bird and squirrel snares, he found it difficult to avoid thinking; and often he would let the wire or the gut slip from his hands and sit motionless, dreaming over the past. And it was such a small, unchequered past, each day, each month and each year following the other, unmarked by any events more exciting than the capture of an unusually large seal or trout, or the arrival of a small band of Siwash Indians, who came periodically to barter furs and moccasins, cartridges and fire-water for the produce of the island.

Stop That Disgusting Sniffle! Soothing "Catarrhose"—A Quick Cure.

The Rich Healing Balsams of Catarrhose Are Death to Colds, Bad Throat and Catarrh. Simply a marvel—you get relief so quick from Catarrhose. Try the inhaler and count ten—your throat and nose are cleared—you feel better at once. Thousands are using Catarrhose today who couldn't live without it.

his eyes rather than his hand. Rath knelt beside him. "Sorry, Rath," the voice said, faintly. "I should like to die quietly, like a gentleman. Is—the grave ready?" The boy nodded. His throat was parched, his eyes fixed with unshed tears. "Good! God bless you, Rath! Die quietly—like—a gentleman!" A smile flickered over the worn face with a ray of the red sunset; and then that awful motionlessness which tells that Death's hand has found its vital spot. The boy's lips parted, as though he were about to cry aloud; then, as if his father were alive and listening, he said, hoarsely: "I did not cry, father, I did not cry!" and he stood erect with folded arms and looked down with grim stoicism at the dead face, bearing his trouble as the dead man had taught him. And not even the sudden whine of the dog, which claved the silence, broke the lad's strange and unnatural calm.

THREE FAMOUS SCIENTISTS

Dr. Andrew Wilson, Dr. Gordon Stables and Dr. Lascelles Scott, the famous English analyst, have all personally tried Zam-Buk and expressed themselves convinced of its great healing value. Mrs. St. Denis, of Thompson St., Weston, Wisnipeg, suffered long with eczema and finally her doctor said only Zam-Buk could cure her—another fine tribute of a scientific man to this great herbal healer. Mrs. St. Denis says: "The eczema broke out on my nose and one side of my face. I could get no sleep because of the irritation and pain, and my face was in such a shocking condition that for two months I did not go out of the house. I applied remedies and my doctor treated me, but without effect, until one day he said that the only thing which would be likely to cure me was Zam-Buk. I procured a supply and to cut a long story short, in a few weeks Zam-Buk cured me completely, leaving no scars."

as keenly and as faithfully as an Indian; he knew how to find the lark's nest in the blue grass, and the squirrel's hoard in the hollow of the trees. He could scent a bear a mile off, and bring it down with one shot from his Winchester as surely as if it had been swung by lightning. He could shoot or snare the wild duck, and no trout could resist his fly. To him every cloud had a meaning, and he was able to predict the weather for three days ahead, and his strength was marvellous, considering his years; there was not an ounce of fat upon him, all was muscle and sinew, tense and supple; it was impossible for him to fall into a clumsy or awkward attitude, and had a painter seen him as he'dived of a morning from the rock into the sometimes ice-cold water, that painter would have known no rest nor peace until he had got the lad on canvas; for the strength was allied with a perfection of form rare indeed.

One night he had been sitting musing at a snare by the light of the oil-lamp suspended from the roof, and thinking of his father's few words, his warning against woman, and wondering but only vaguely, why God had made a creature so dangerous and destructive, when the dog which had been lying at his feet stirred uneasily and emitted the stifled bark by which a dog shows that he has heard something in his sleep. Rath, who had learnt to regard the slightest indication from one of Nature's children, rose and listened.

"What is it, Carl?" he said.

The dog, a rough-haired sheep dog, which his father had bought as a puppy from the Indians, rose and moved slowly and shufflingly towards the door, and Rath opened it and looked out. There was a half moon, and its light fell softly on the sea, and pierced the mass of firs so that they seemed to stand up like gigantic needles against the sky. The scene was so beautiful that though Rath had seen it so often he stood and gazed at it with dreamy content.

Carl went out, sniffing at the ground, and made a circuit—of the hut, but came back and lay down under the table as if satisfied, and Rath shut and barred the door and returned to his snare.

But though the dog seemed satisfied, a vague feeling of unrest took possession of Rath, and he found it hard to sleep, though as a rule he was off a moment or two after his head had met the rough pillow. He fell asleep after a while, but suddenly sprang up, awakened sharply by a sound as 'strange as it was startling.

He had heard, or fancied he had heard, the cry of a human being, a cry for help. With one hand thrust against the bed, he listened, with his head erect, his eyes fixed. He heard the sound again; Carl had heard it also, for he was standing stiffly, his ears pricked, his eyes fixed on the door. Rath sprang lightly from the bed, slipped on his clothes, and catching up his revolver, opened the door slowly.

No one was in sight, but presently the sound broke the stillness of the night. It came from the sea, and Rath, going quickly down the rise to the beach, saw a boat floating in the incoming tide. The night mist did not allow him to see who was in the boat, but the cry for help was faintly towards him; and, running to his dug-out canoe, he launched it, stepping in at the moment it floated, and paddled towards the boat.

He made little or no sound, said not a word; and Carl, who had leapt into the canoe with him, lay silent also, peering curiously at the boat. Every now and then the cry arose, breaking the intense stillness; but after each interval the cry became fainter, as if the person who uttered it were losing strength.

Rath paddled quickly, but noiselessly, and presently he came near enough to see a slight figure seated on the mid-thwart of the boat.

It was a figure dressed like a sailor lad, and its face was turned towards the shore; a face pale and sharp with the anxiety, despair, weariness, and hope which filled its breast.

Rath, whose keen eyes had seen the figure before he himself was seen, felt stirred with pity, a pity more intense even than that which he had felt when Carl had once broken his leg.

With a few strokes of the paddle he sent the canoe along swiftly; the lad in the boat saw him, and uttered a cry of joy and relief, and half rose, supporting himself by clutching the gunwale with one hand, and shading his eyes with the other.

Rath ran alongside the boat, caught the edge, and stared at the thin white face inquiringly.

With a cry, the slight figure leant down towards him, both hands outstretched. "Oh, thank God! thank God!" it said. "We are saved! saved! Oh! at last! at last!"

TWO WOMEN AVOID OPERATIONS

By Taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

Chicago, Ill.—"I must thank you with all my heart for Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. I used to go to my doctor for pills and remedies and they did not help me. I had headaches and could not eat, and the doctor claimed I had female trouble and must have an operation. I read in the paper about Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and I have taken it and feel fine. A lady said one day, 'Oh, I feel so tired all the time and have headaches.' I said, 'Take Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound,' and she did and feels fine now."—Mrs. M. R. KARSCHNICK, 1438 N. Paulina Street, Chicago, Illinois.

The Other Case. Dayton, Ohio.—"Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound relieved me of pains in my side that I had for years, and which doctors' medicines failed to relieve. It has certainly saved me from an operation. I will be glad to assist you by a personal letter to any woman in the same condition."—Mrs. J. W. SHERER, 126 Cass St., Dayton, Ohio.

If you want special advice write to Lydia E. Pinkham Medicine Co. (confidential) Lynn, Mass. Your letter will be opened, read and answered by a woman, and held in strict confidence.
